

E

199

P22

7

Class _____

Book: _____

COPYRIGHT DEPOSIT

HISTORICAL CLASSIC READINGS

BRADDOCK'S DEFEAT.

FRANCIS PARKMAN.

WITH INTRODUCTION.

NEW YORK:

EFFINGHAM MAYNARD & Co., PUBLISHERS,

771 BROADWAY AND 67 & 69 NINTH STREET.

KELLOGG'S EDITIONS.

SHAKESPEARE'S PLAYS.

Each Play in One Volume.

Text Carefully Expurgated for Use in Mixed Classes.

With Portrait, Notes, Introduction to Shakespeare's Grammar, Examination Papers, and Plan of Study.

(SELECTED.)

By BRAINERD KELLOGG, A.M.,

*Professor of the English Language and Literature in the Brooklyn Polytechnic Institute, and author of a "Text-Book on Rhetoric," a "Text-Book on English Literature," and one of the authors of Beed &
Kellogg's "Lessons in English."*

The notes have been especially prepared and selected, to meet the requirements of School and College Students, from editions by eminent English scholars.

We are confident that teachers who examine these editions will pronounce them better adapted to the wants of the class-room than any others published. These are the only American Editions of these Plays that have been carefully expurgated for use in mixed classes.

Printed from large type, attractively bound in cloth, and sold at nearly one half the price of other School Editions of Shakespeare.

The following Plays, each in one volume, are now ready:

MERCHANT OF VENICE.
JULIUS CÆSAR.
MACBETH.
TEMPEST.
HAMLET.
KING HENRY V.
KING LEAR.

KING HENRY IV., Part I.
KING HENRY VIII.
AS YOU LIKE IT.
KING RICHARD III.
A MIDSUMMER-NIGHT'S DREAM.
A WINTER'S TALE.

Mailing price, 30 cents per copy. Special Price to Teachers.

FULL DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE SENT ON APPLICATION.

BRADDOCK'S DEFEAT.

1755.

THE FRENCH AND ENGLISH IN AMERICA.

BY FRANCIS PARKMAN.

GENERAL BRADDOCK.

NEW YORK :

EFFINGHAM MAYNARD & CO., PUBLISHERS,

771 BROADWAY AND 67 & 69 NINTH STREET.

Parkman's Works. Library Edition.

The Works of Francis Parkman, as follows:

FRANCE AND ENGLAND IN NORTH AMERICA. A SERIES OF HISTORICAL NARRATIVES. 7 vols.

Comprising:

Pioneers of France in the New World. 1 vol.

The Jesuits in North America. 1 vol.

La Salle and the Discovery of the Great West. 1 vol.

The Old Régime in Canada under Louis XIV. 1 vol.

Count Frontenac and New France under Louis XIV. 1 vol.

Montcalm and Wolfe. 2 vols.

THE CONSPIRACY OF PONTIAC, AND THE INDIAN WAR AFTER THE CONQUEST OF CANADA. 2 vols.

THE OREGON TRAIL: SKETCHES OF PRAIRIE AND ROCKY MOUNTAIN LIFE. 1 vol.

In all, 10 vols. 8vo. With Portraits and Maps. Cloth, $25.00.

Parkman's Works. Popular Edition.

The above, in 10 vols. 12mo, cloth, in a very attractive style, with maps, portraits, etc. $15.00.

This new edition of Francis Parkman's fascinating Histories, printed from the same large type as the octavo edition, has proved very successful, several large editions having been sold. With the exception of "Montcalm and Wolfe," Mr. Parkman's new work, the Popular Edition can be supplied only in sets, volumes of the octavo edition alone being furnished separately.

LITTLE, BROWN, & COMPANY, PUBLISHERS, BOSTON.

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTICE OF THE AUTHOR.

FRANCIS PARKMAN, the son of an esteemed clergyman of the same name, was born in Boston, Massachusetts, September 16, 1823. After completing his college course at Harvard in 1844, he studied law for two years, but abandoned it in 1846. He travelled in Europe in the latter part of 1843 and the beginning of 1844, and in 1846 set out to explore the Rocky Mountains.

He lived for several months among the Dakota Indians and the still wilder and remoter tribes, and incurred hardships and privations that made him an invalid. An interesting account of this expedition is given in his book The Oregon Trail. Mr. Parkman next occupied himself with historical composition. Familiar with actual Indian life on and beyond the frontier, he naturally turned his attention to the many picturesque scenes of a similar character in our annals.

His chief work has been a series of volumes intended to illustrate the rise and fall of the French dominion in America, which are distinguished for brilliant style and accurate research. By their thoroughness of research, revealing, in many cases, records in manuscript hitherto inaccessible ; by their calm and judicious judgments, and by their picturesque narratives, these volumes have won an acceptance as classics in the department of early American history.

“The settlement of North America, and its early conquest by the French ; their long and weary battle with the elements and the Indians ; their splendid discoveries and disastrous mistakes ; the great effort of the Roman Church, under Jesuit leadership, to retrieve her losses from the Reformation by the conversion of the red men of America ; the magnificent deeds of heroism and glorious acts of martyrdom which accompanied the planting of the cross on the St. Lawrence and its tributary lakes, and in the far West, constitute the outline of Mr. Parkman's still unfinished work. His works are not the fancy picture-painting of romance, but the conscientious retracing of the past, till the wild scenes of the forest throb and thrill with life. Their value consists in fidelity to nature and actual facts, and in tracing out the characteristics of the aborigines, and their contact with the first civilization of America.

They touch the very springs of our national life. They show the reason why the red man has succumbed to his white brother, and they illustrate the struggle between liberty and absolutism. Thus, though dealing with events of two centuries ago, and describing how our earliest institutions were born out of the necessities of the hour, they record the first beginnings of life where now many millions of busy feet tread in the paths of industry, and where strong nations have entered upon the fruits of their labor, who took their lives in their hands to convert the wily Indian, to discover a new pathway to China, or to fill their coffers from fabulous mines of treasure. It is a noticeable fact that two motives led to all the discoveries and early settlements in this country out of New England—the greed of gold and the passion for converts. What Mr. Parkman calls “the grand crisis of Canadian history,” the English conquest had a much wider application.

“England imposed, by the sword, on reluctant Canada, the boon of national and ordered liberty. Through centuries of striving she had advanced from stage to stage of progress, deliberate and calm, never breaking with her past, but making each fresh gain the basis of a new success, enlarging popular liberties while bating nothing of that height and force of individual development which is the brain and heart of civilization ; and now, through a hard earned victory, she taught the conquered colony to share the blessings she had won. A happier calamity never befell a people than the conquest of Canada by British arms."

What England did for Canada she has done for the United States everywhere, and this first contact of France, and then of England with the savage life of America, it has been Mr. Parkman's good fortune to describe. While we are reading an interesting story we are tracing out the rude hamlet of the forefathers; and the pioneer, the trapper, the priest, and the fur-trader lead in the march of civilization. Though the stories of these pioneers in conquest and religion seem already remote and legendary in face of the occupation of the land they once held by a present civilization, and though the trapper and the Indian are now shorn of their pristine glory and will soon become the relics of a by-gone age, the volumes of Mr. Parkman can never grow old in interest. They contain too much which is inwrought with our very life to become obsolete, and they are so largely the history of the first era of civilization in America, that, though the fascination and charm of legendary story are felt on every page, they can never pass into the list of old romance. Mr. Parkman has visited France several times to examine the French archives in connection with his historical labors.

His publications in his chosen field are: "The Oregon Trail;" "The Conspiracy of Pontiac;" "Pioneers of France in the New World;" "Jesuits in North America;" "Discovery of the Great West;" "The Old Régime in Canada;" "Count Frontenac and New France under Louis XIV.," and "Montcalm and Wolfe." Mr. Parkman is at the present time (1888) engaged on another volume which is designed to complete the series.

FRENCH & INDIAN WAR AND THE REVOLUTION.

INTRODUCTION.

It is the nature of great events to obscure the great events that came before them. The Seven Years War¹ in Europe is seen but dimly through revolutionary convulsions and Napoleonic tempests; and the same contest in America is half lost to sight behind the storm-cloud of the War of Independence. Few at this day see the momentous issues involved in it, or the greatness of the danger that it averted. The strife that armed all the civilized world began here. "Such was the complication of political interests," says Voltaire, "that a cannon-shot fired in America could give the signal that set Europe in a blaze." Not quite. It was not a cannon-shot, but a volley from the hunting-pieces of a few backwoodsmen, commanded by a Virginian youth, George Washington.²

To us of this day, the result of the American part of the war seems a foregone conclusion. It was far from being so; and very far from being so regarded by our forefathers. The numerical superiority³ of the British colonies was offset by organic weaknesses fatal to vigorous and united action. Nor at the outset did they, or the mother-country, aim at conquering Canada, but

1. The Seven Years' War.—"The treaty of Aix-la Chapelle gave a brief rest to Europe, which was broken by the Seven Years' War in 1756, brought on by a coalition of France and several of the other European states, against Frederick the Great of Prussia. Great Britain and France quarreled about their colonial possessions in North America, and during this struggle France lost Canada and some of her West Indian possessions."—Anderson's New General History.

2. See page 27.

3. At this time there were sixty thousand French settlers proposing to imprison on the sea-coast more than a million Englishmen.

only at pushing back her boundaries. Canada—using the name in its restricted sense—was a position of great strength ; and even when her dependencies were overcome, she could hold her own against forces far superior. Armies could reach her only by three routes,—the Lower St. Lawrence on the east, the Upper St. Lawrence on the west, and Lake Champlain on the south. The first access was guarded by a fortress almost impregnable by nature, and the second by a long chain of dangerous rapids;⁴ while the third offered a series of points easy to defend.

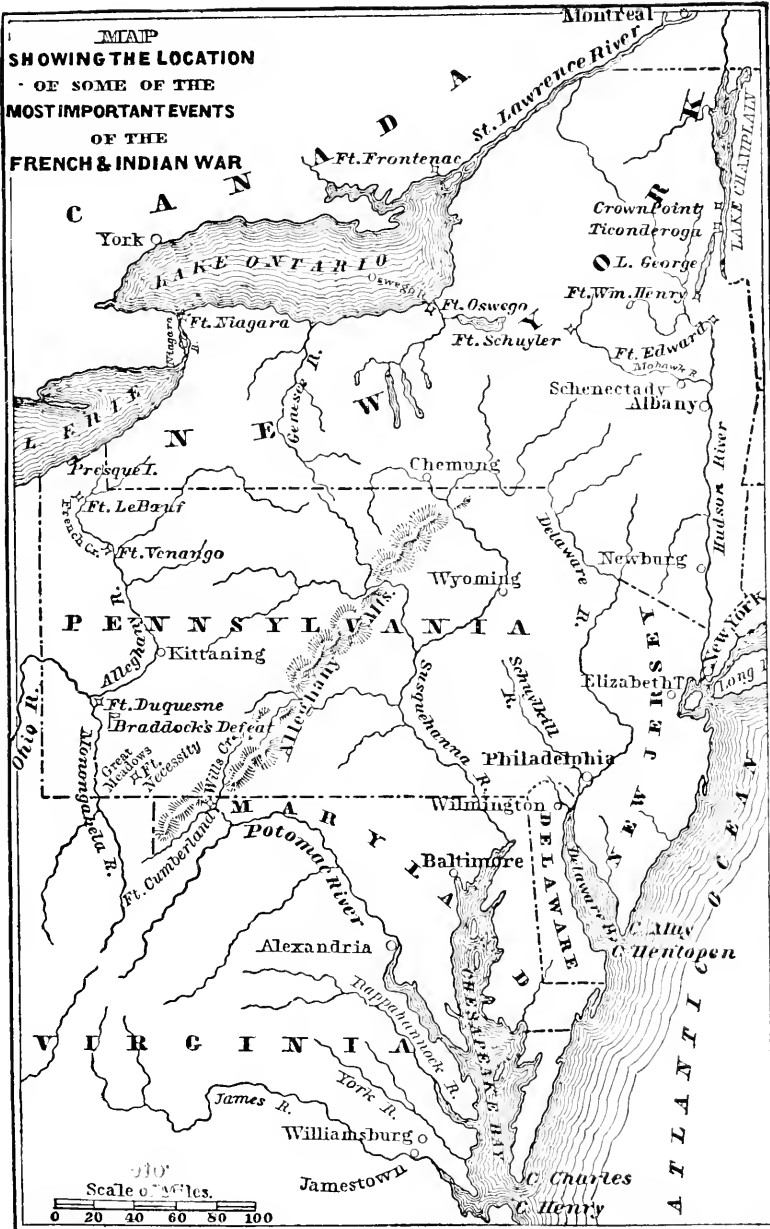

The French claimed all America, from the Alleghanies to the Rocky Mountains, and from Mexico and Florida to the North Pole, except only the ill-defined possessions of the English on the borders of Hudson Bay; and to these vast regions, with adjacent islands, they gave the general name of New France. They controlled the highways of the continent, for they held its two great rivers. First, they had seized the St. Lawrence, and then planted themselves at the mouth of the Mississippi. Canada at the north, and Louisiana at the south, were the keys of a boundless interior, rich with incalculable possibilities. The English colonies, ranged along the Atlantic coast, had no royal road to the great inland, and were, in a manner, shut between the mountains and the sea. The possession of Canada was a question of diplomacy as well as of war. If England conquered her, she might restore her, as she had lately restored Cape Breton.⁵ She had an interest in keeping France alive on the American continent. More than one clear eye saw, at the middle of the last century, that the subjection of Canada would lead to a revolt of

4. Quebec. Rapids of Lachine and others. Crown Point and Ticonderoga.

5. Cape Breton.—In 1713, England, in the reign of Queen Anne, waged war against Louis XIV. By the treaty of Utrecht England possessed herself of Acadia. Cape Breton, an island adjoining Acadia, was sufferred to remain a French possession; and here France hastened, at vast expense, to build and fortify Louisburg for the protection of her American trade. It was called "The Gibraltar of America." In 1758 it was permanently occupied by the British.

MAP SHOWING THE LOCATION OF SOME OF THE
MOST IMPORTANT EVENTS OF THE FRENCH & INDIAN WAR

the British colonies. So long as an active and enterprising enemy threatened their borders, they could not break with the mother-country, because they needed her help. And if the arms of France had prospered in the other hemisphere; if she had gained in Europe or Asia territories with which to buy back what she had lost in America,—then, in all likelihood, Canada would have passed again into her hands.

The most momentous and far-reaching question ever brought to issue on this continent was: Shall France remain here, or shall she not? If, by diplomacy or war, she had preserved but the half, or less than the half, of her American possessions, then a barrier would have been set to the spread of the English-speaking races; there would have been no Revolutionary War; and for a long time, at least, no independence. It was not a question of scanty populations strung along the banks of the St. Lawrence; it was—or under a government of any worth it would have been—a question of the armies and generals of France.

The Seven Years' War made England what she is. It crippled the commerce of her rival, ruined France in two continents, and blighted her as a colonial power. It gave England the control of the seas and the mastery of North America and India, made her the first of commercial nations, and prepared that vast colonial system that has planted new Englands in every quarter of the globe. And while it made England what she is, it supplied to the United States the indispensable condition of their greatness, if not of their national existence.

The following account of Braddock's Defeat has been selected from Montcalm and Wolfe (short connecting passages being taken from The Conspiracy of Pontiac), with the full permission of its distinguished author. The size of this book compels the occasional omission of what may be considered not strictly essential to the narrative.

In giving this choice extract from Mr. Parkman's writings, it is expected to create in the mind of the young reader no more than an appetite for the author's complete works, which are so conspicuous among the writings of our foremost historians, and which should have a place in every school library.

BRADDOCK'S DEFEAT.

CHAPTER I.

THE AMERICAN COMBATANTS.

1700—1755.

FRENCH America had two heads,—one among the snows of Canada, and one among the canebrakes of Louisiana; one communicating with the world through the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and the other through the Gulf of Mexico. These vital points were feebly connected by a chain of military posts,—slender, and often interrupted,—circling through the wilderness nearly three thousand miles. Midway between Canada and Louisiana lay the valley of the Ohio. If the English should seize it, they would sever the chain of posts, and cut French America asunder. If the French held it, and entrenched themselves well along its eastern limits, they would shut their rivals between the Alleghanies and the sea, control all the tribes of the West, and turn them, in case of war, against the English borders,—a frightful and insupportable scourge.

Canada lay ensconced behind rocks and forests. All along her southern boundaries, between her and her English foes, lay a broad tract of wilderness, shaggy with primeval woods. Innumerable streams gurgled beneath their shadows; innumerable lakes gleamed in the fiery sunsets; innumerable mountains bared their rocky foreheads to the wind. These wastes were ranged by her savage allies; and no enemy could steal upon her unawares. Through the midst of them stretched Lake Champlain, pointing straight to the heart of the British settlements,— a watery thoroughfare of mutual attack, and the only approach by which, without a long détour by wilderness or sea, a hostile army could come within striking distance of the colony. The French advanced post of Fort Frederic, called Crown Point' by the English, barred the narrows of the lake, which thence spread northward to the portals of Canada guarded by Fort St. Jean (sau-jean).² Southwestward, some fourteen hundred miles as a bird flies, and twice as far by the practicable routes of travel, was Louisiana, the second of the two heads of New France; while between lay the realms of solitude where the Mississippi rolled its sullen³ tide, and the Ohio wound its belt of silver through the verdant woodlands.

To whom belonged this world of prairies and forests? France claimed it by right of discovery and occupation. It was her explorers who, after De Soto,⁴ first set foot on it. The question of right, it is true, mattered little; for, right or wrong, neither claimant would yield her pretensions so long as she had strength to uphold them; yet one point is worth a moment's notice. The French had established an excellent system in the distribution of their American lands. Whoever received a grant from the Crown was required to improve it, and this within reasonable time. If he did not, the land ceased to be his, and was given to

1. Crown Point.—A strong fortress on the western shore of Lake Champlain. The scene of many battles between the French and English, and later between the English and American forces. See map.

2. Fort St. Jean.—A fortress at the northern extremity of Lake Champlain. See map.

3. Sullen Tide.—The water of the Mississippi, below the mouth of the Missouri, is very muddy.

4. De Soto, the Spanish explorer, had served under Pizarro in Peru.

In 1539 he led an expedition through the forests from Florida and discovered the Mississippi River.

For nearly a century and a half after this time no permanent settlement was made there. In 1680, La Salle, a French explorer, "traversed the Mississippi from the Illinois River to the Gulf. He claimed the enormous region from the Alleghany Mountains to the Pacific, from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, as the possession of the French king."

another more able or industrious. An international extension of her own principle would have destroyed the pretensions of France to all the countries of the West. She had called them hers for three fourths of a century, and they were still a howling waste, yielding nothing to civilization but beaver-skins, with here and there a fort, trading-post, or mission, and three or four puny hamlets by the Mississippi and the Detroit. We have seen how she might have made for herself an indisputable title, and peopled the solitudes with a host to maintain it. She would not ; others were at hand who both would and could ; and the late claimant, disinherited and forlorn, would soon be left to count the cost of her bigotry.⁵

The thirteen British colonies were alike, insomuch as they all had representative governments, and a basis of English law. But the differences among them were great. Some were purely English ; others were made up of various races, though the Anglo-Saxon was always predominant. Some had one prevailing religious creed ; others had many creeds. Some had charters, and some had not. In most cases the governor was appointed by the Crown ; in Pennsylvania and Maryland he was appointed by a feudal proprietor,⁶ and in Connecticut and Rhode Island he was chosen by the people. The differences of disposition and character were still greater than those of form.

The four northern colonies, known collectively as New England, were an exception to the general rule of diversity. The smallest, Rhode Island, had features all its own ; but the rest were substantially one in nature and origin. The principal among them, Massachusetts, may serve as the type of all. It

5. Toward the close of her dominion in Canada, France expended about one million sterling on her unprofitable colony, mainly in building forts along the enormous line from Quebec to New Orleans, in order to shut in the English colonists.

6. Feudal Proprietor.—One holding the title to large territories of land in his own right.

was a mosaic of little village republics, firmly cemented together, and formed into a single body politic through representatives sent to the "General Court"* at Boston. Yet there were no distinct class-lines, and popular power, like popular education, was widely diffused. Practically Massachusetts was almost independent of the mother-country. Its people were purely English, of sound yeoman stock, with an abundant leaven drawn from the best of the Puritan gentry; but their original character had been somewhat modified by changed conditions of life. A harsh and exacting creed, with its stiff formalism and its prohibition of wholesome recreation; excess in the pursuit of gain;—the struggle for existence on a hard and barren soil; and the isolation of a narrow village life,—joined to produce, in the meaner sort, qualities which were unpleasant, and sometimes repulsive. Puritanism was not an unmixed blessing. Its view of human nature was dark, and its attitude towards it one of repression. It strove to crush out not only what is evil, but much that is innocent and salutary.

The New England colonies abounded in high examples of public and private virtue, though not always under the most prepossessing forms. They were conspicuous, moreover, for intellectual activity, and were by no means without intellectual eminence. Massachusetts had produced at least two men whose fame had crossed the sea,—Edwards,⁷ who out of the grim theology of Calvin mounted to sublime heights of mystical speculation; and Franklin,⁸ famous already by his discoveries in electricity. On the other hand,

7. Jonathan Edwards, the most eminent divine of his time, achieved a European reputation, and his powerful reasoning was renowned wherever the doctrines of Calvin were revered.

8. Benjamin Franklin, 1706–1790.

—The most eminent man of his time. Philosopher, scientist, statesman, philanthropist. "Of the four greatest men that this country has produced he stands first in the order of time — Franklin, Washington, Webster, Lincoln."

* General Court —The legislature: so called from having had, in colonial days, judicial power. "The General Court of Massachusetts" is a name yet given to the legislature.

there were few genuine New Englanders who, however personally modest, could divest themselves of the notion that they belonged to a people in an especial manner the object of divine approval ; and this self-righteousness, along with certain other traits, failed to commend the Puritan colonies to the favor of their fellows. Then, as now, New England was best known to her neighbors by her worst side.

In one point, however, she found general applause. She was regarded as the most military among the British colonies. This reputation was well founded, and is easily explained. More than all the rest, she lay open to attack. The long waving line of the New England border, with its lonely hamlets and scattered farms, extended from the Kennebec to beyond the Connecticut, and was everywhere vulnerable to the guns and tomahawks of the neighboring French and their savage allies. The colonies towards the south had thus far been safe from danger. New York alone was within striking distance of the Canadian war-parties. That province then consisted of a line of settlements up the Hudson and the Mohawk, and was little exposed to attack except at its northern end, which was guarded by the fortified town of Albany, with its outlying posts, and by the friendly and warlike Mohawks, whose "castles"⁹ were close at hand.

Thus New England had borne the heaviest brunt of the preceding wars, not only by the forest, but also by the sea ; for the French of Acadia and Cape Breton confronted her coast, and she was often at blows with them. Fighting had been a necessity with her, and she had met the emergency after a method extremely defective, but the best that circumstances would permit. Having no trained officers and no disciplined soldiers, and being too poor to maintain either, she borrowed her warriors from the workshop and the plow, and officered them with lawyers, merchants, mechanics, or farmers. To compare them with good regular troops would be folly ; but they did, on the whole, better than

9. Castles.—Indian towns, and possibly referring to some of the Indian fortifications discovered in this vicinity.

could have been expected, and in the last war achieved the brilliant success of the capture of Louisburg.¹⁰ This exploit, due partly to native hardihood and partly to good luck, greatly enhanced the military repute of New England, or rather was one of the chief sources of it.

The great colony of Virginia stood in strong contrast to New England. In both the population was English ; but the one was Puritan with Roundhead¹¹ traditions, and the other, so far as concerned its governing class, Anglican with Cavalier¹² traditions. In the one, every man, woman, and child could read and write ; in the other, Sir William Berkeley¹³ once thanked God that there were no free schools, and no prospect of any for a century. The hope had found fruition. The lower classes of Virginia were as untaught as the warmest friend of popular ignorance could wish. New England had a native literature more than respectable under the circumstances, while Virginia had none ; numerous industries, while Virginia was all agriculture, with but a single crop¹⁴ ; a homogeneous society and a democratic

10. Louisburg.—In 1744 France and England went to war again, and the colonists were drawn into it. Gov. Shirley of Mass. formed an extensive plan for the capture of the great stronghold of Louisburg, in Cape Breton, by New England, aided by the English fleet, and this was accomplished. At the close of the war (1748), Louisburg was returned to the French, and it remained in her possession for ten years more and then passed finally away from her, along with all the rest of her American territory.

11. Roundhead.—A derisive name given to the Puritans because of their custom of wearing their hair cropped short.

12. Cavalier or royalist. — This class included the greater part of the nobility, clergy, and landed gentry.

13. Sir Wm. Berkeley was first appointed governor of Va. in 1641. He was a strong supporter of Charles I. in the civil war, and maintained the royal authority in Va. until the death of the king. In 1659 he, a second time, became governor of Va. He died in England in 1677.

14. Tobacco.—There has never been a community, probably, in which any one great staple has played such a part as in Virginia. Tobacco founded the colony and gave it wealth. It was the currency of Virginia. The clergy were paid and taxes were levied by the burgesses in tobacco.

spirit, while her rival was an aristocracy. Virginian society was distinctly stratified. On the lowest level were the negro slaves, nearly as numerous as all the rest together ; next, the indented servants and the poor whites, of low origin, good-humored, but boisterous, and sometimes vicious ; next, the small and despised class of tradesmen and mechanics ; next, the farmers and lesser planters, who were mainly of good English stock, and who merged insensibly into the ruling class of the great landowners. It was these last who represented the colony and made the laws. They may be described as English country squires transplanted to a warm climate and turned slave-masters. They sustained their position by entails¹⁵, and constantly undermined it by the reckless profusion which ruined them at last.

Many of them were well born, with an immense pride of descent, increased by the habit of domination. Indolent and energetic by turns ; rich in natural gifts, and often poor in book-learning, though some, in the lack of good teaching at home, had been bred in the English universities ; high-spirited, generous to a fault ; keeping open house in their capacious mansions, among vast tobacco-fields and toiling negroes, and living in a rude pomp where the fashions of St. James¹⁶ were somewhat oddly grafted on the roughness of the plantation,—what they wanted in schooling was supplied by an education which books alone would have been impotent to give, the education which came with the possession and exercise of political power, and the sense of a position to maintain, joined to a bold spirit of independence and a patriotic attachment to the Old Dominion. They were few in number : they raced, gambled, drank, and swore ; they did everything that in Puritan eyes was most reprehensible ; and in the day of

15. Entails.—To settle the descent of an estate so that it cannot be bequeathed at pleasure. This system formed the surest foundation of a strong and permanent aristocracy. It fell during the Revolution beneath the attacks headed by Jefferson.

16. St. James.—The Court of St. James, the royal residence. In this connection the term signifies “the fashions of the English nobility.”

need they gave the United Colonies a body of statesmen and orators which had no equal on the continent.¹⁷

The essential antagonism of Virginia and New England was afterwards to become, and to remain for a century, an element of the first influence in American history. Each might have learned much from the other ; but neither did so till, at last, the strife of their contending principles shook the continent. Pennsylvania differed widely from both. She was a conglomerate of creeds and races,—English, Irish, Germans, Dutch and Swedes ; Quakers, Lutherans, Presbyterians, Romanists, Moravians, and a variety of nondescript sects. The Quakers prevailed in the eastern districts ; quiet, industrious, virtuous, and serenely obstinate. Virginia and New England had each a strong distinctive character. Pennsylvania, with her heterogeneous population, had none but that which she owed to the sober neutral tints of Quaker existence. A more thriving colony there was not on the continent. Life, if monotonous, was smooth and contented. Trade and the arts grew. Philadelphia, next to Boston, was the largest town in British America ; and was, moreover, the intellectual center of the middle and southern colonies.

New York had not as yet reached the relative prominence which her geographical position and inherent strength afterwards gave her. The English, joined to the Dutch, the original settlers, were the dominant population ; but a half-score of other languages were spoken in the province, the chief among them being that of the Huguenot French in the southern parts, and that of Germans on the Mohawk. In religion, the province was divided between the Anglican Church, with government support and popular dislike, and numerous dissenting sects, chiefly Lutherans, Independents, Presbyterians, and members of the Dutch Reformed Church. The little city of New York, like its great successor, was the most cosmopolitan place on the continent, and probably the gayest. It had, in abundance, balls, concerts, theatricals, and evening clubs, with plentiful dances and other amusements for the poorer classes. Thither in the winter months came the great hereditary proprietors¹⁸ on the Hudson. Pennsylvania was feudal in form, and not in spirit; Virginia in spirit, and not in form; New England in neither; and New York largely in both. This social crystallization had, it is true, many opponents. In politics, as in religion, there were sharp antagonisms and frequent quarrels. They centered in the city; for in the well-stocked dwellings of the Dutch farmers along the Hudson there reigned a tranquil and prosperous routine; and the Dutch border town of Albany had not its like in America for unruffled conversatism and quaint picturesqueness.

17. In one generation Virginia produced George Washington, John Marshall, Thomas Jefferson, Patrick Henry, and James Madison.

Of the other colonies, the briefest mention will suffice: New Jersey, with its wholesome population of farmers; tobacco-growing Maryland, which, but for its proprietary government and numerous Roman Catholics, might pass for another Virginia, inferior in growth, and less decisive in features; Delaware, a modest appendage of Pennsylvania; wild and rude North Carolina; and, farther on, South Carolina and Georgia, too remote from the seat of war to take a noteworthy part in it. The attitude of these various colonies towards each other is hardly conceivable to an American of the present time. They had no political tie except a common allegiance to the British Crown. Communication between them was difficult and slow, by rough roads traced often through primeval forests.¹⁹ Between some of them there was less of sympathy than of jealousy kindled by conflicting interests or perpetual disputes concerning boundaries.

The patriotism of the colonist was bounded by the lines of his government, except in the compact and kindred colonies of New England, which were socially united, though politically distinct. The country of the New Yorker was New York, and the country of the Virginian was Virginia. The New England colonies had once confederated; but, kindred as they were, they had long ago dropped apart. At rare intervals, under the pressure of an

18. Hereditary Proprietors.—The descendants of the proprietors to whom had been ceded portions of the territory along the Hudson River.

19. Primeval Forests — Meaning?

emergency, some of them would try to act in concert ; and, except in New England, the results had been most discouraging. Nor was it this segregation²⁰ only that unfitted them for war. They were all subject to popular legislatures, through whom alone money and men could be raised ; and these elective bodies were sometimes factious and selfish, and not always either far-sighted or reasonable. Moreover, they were in a state of ceaseless friction with their governors, who represented the king, or, what was worse, the feudal proprietary.

These disputes, though varying in intensity, were found everywhere except in the two small colonies which chose their own governors ; and they were premonitions of the movement towards independence which ended in the war of Revolution. The occasion of difference mattered little. Active or latent, the quarrel was always present. In New York it turned on a question of the governor's salary ; in Pennsylvania on the taxation of the proprietary estates ; in Virginia on a fee exacted for the issue of land patents. It was sure to arise whenever some public crisis gave the representatives of the people an opportunity of extorting concessions from the representative of the Crown, or gave the representative of the Crown an opportunity to gain a point for prerogative. That is to say, the time when action was most needed was the time chosen for obstructing it.

In Canada there was no popular legislature to embarrass the central power. The people, like an army, obeyed the word of command,—a military advantage beyond all price.

Divided in government ; divided in origin, feelings, and principles ; jealous of each other, jealous of the Crown ; the people at war with the executive, and, by the fermentation of internal politics, blinded to an outward danger that seemed remote and vague,—such were the conditions under which the British colonies drifted into a war that was to decide the fate of the continent.

20. Segregation.—Separation from others.

CHAPTER II.

COLLISION OF THE RIVAL COLONIES.

THE people of the northern English colonies had learned to regard their Canadian neighbors with the bitterest enmity. To the sons of the Puritans, their enemy was doubly odious. They hated him as a Frenchman, and they hated him as a Papist. Hitherto he had waged his murderous warfare from a distance, wasting their settlements with rapid onsets, fierce and transient as a summer storm ; but now, with enterprising audacity, he was intrenching himself on their very borders. The English hunter, in the lonely wilderness of Vermont, as by the warm glow of sunset he piled the spruce boughs for his woodland bed, started as a deep, low sound struck faintly on his ear, the evening gun of Fort Frederic, booming over lake and forests. The erection of this fort, better known among the English as Crown Point, was a piece of daring encroachment which justly kindled resentment in the northern colonies. But it was not here that the immediate occasion of a final rupture was to arise.

By an article of the treaty of Utrecht¹ confirmed by that of Aix la Chapelle² (akes-lah-sha-pel'), Acadia had been ceded to England; but scarcely was the latter treaty signed, when debates sprang up touching the limits of the ceded province. Commissioners were named on either side to adjust the disputed boundary; but the claims of the rival powers proved utterly irreconcilable, and

1. Treaty of Utrecht. (April 11, 1713.)—By this treaty France ceded to England important possessions in the New World, consisting chiefly of Acadia, now Nova Scotia.

2. Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. — A treaty of peace between England and France (Oct. 7, 1748). By the articles of this treaty Cape Breton was given up to the French in a compromise for restoring the French conquests in the Low Countries to the Queen of Hungary.

all negotiation was fruitless. Meantime, the French and English forces in Acadia began to assume a belligerent attitude, and indulge their ill blood in mutual aggression and reprisal.³ But while this game was played on the coasts on the Atlantic, interests of far greater moment were at stake in the west.

The people of the middle⁴ colonies, placed by their local position beyond reach of the French, had heard with great composure of the sufferings of their New England brethren, and felt little concern at a danger so doubtful and remote. There were those among them, however, who with greater foresight had been quick to perceive the ambitious projects of the rival nation ; and, as early as 1716, Spotswood,⁵ governor of Virginia, had urged the expediency of securing the valley of the Ohio by a series of forts and settlements. His proposal was coldly received, and his plan fell to the ground. The time at length was come when the danger was approaching too near to be slighted longer. In 1748, an association, called the Ohio Company, was formed with the view of making settlements in the region beyond the Alleghanies ; and two years later, Gist, the company's surveyor, to the great disgust of the Indians, carried chain and compass down the Ohio as far as the falls at Louisville. But so dilatory were the English, that before any effectual steps were taken, their agile enemies appeared upon the scene.

In the spring of 1753, the middle provinces were startled at the tidings that French troops had crossed Lake Erie, fortified themselves at the point of Presqu'-Isle,⁶ (presk-eel) and pushed forward to the northern branches of the Ohio. Upon this, Governor Dinwiddie,⁷ of Virginia, resolved to dispatch a message requiring their removal from territories which he claimed

3. Reprisal.—That which is reprised or retaken ; especially that which is taken from an enemy by way of retaliation or indemnity.

4. Middle Colonies.—Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia.

5. Alexander Spotswood.—Governor, 1710–1722.

6. Presqu' Isle.—A strong fort was built here on Lake Erie, where the city of Erie, Pa., now stands.

7. Robert Dinwiddie.—Governor, 1752–1758.

as belonging to the British crown ; and looking about him for the person best qualified to act as messenger, he made choice of George Washington, a young man twenty-one years of age, adjutant general of the Virginian militia.

Washington set out for the trading station of the Ohio Company on Will's Creek ; and thence, at the middle of November, struck into the wilderness with Christopher Gist as a guide, Vanbraam, a Dutchman, as French interpreter, Davison, a trader, as Indian interpreter, and four woodsmen as servants. They went to the forks of the Ohio, and then down the river to Logstown.⁸ There Washington had various parleys with the Indians ; and thence, after vexatious delays, he continued his journey towards Fort Le Bœuf,⁹ (le berf) accompanied by the friendly chief called the Half-King and by three of his tribesmen. For several days they followed the traders' path, pelted with unceasing rain and snow, and came at last to the old Indian town of Venango, where French Creek enters the Alleghany. Here there was an English trading-house ; but the French had seized it, raised their flag over it, and turned it into a military outpost. Joncaire¹⁰ (zhon-caire) was in command, with two subalterns ; and nothing could exceed their civility. They invited the strangers to supper ; and, says Washington, "the wine, as they dosed themselves pretty plentifully with it, soon banished the restraint which at first appeared in their conversation, and gave a license to their tongues to reveal their sentiments more freely. They told me that it was their absolute design to take possession of the Ohio, and they would do it ; for that although they were sensible the English could raise two men for their one, yet they knew their motions were too slow and dilatory to prevent any undertaking of theirs."¹¹

8. Logstown. — A small settlement (in Ohio) on the Ohio River not far from Fort Duquesne,

9. Fort Le Bœuf and Venango. — Locate them on the map.

10. Joncaire. — The French commandant at Venango. Here was the advanced post of the French.

11. "They pretend to have an undoubted right to the river, from

With all their civility, the French officers did their best to entice away Washington's Indians; and it was with extreme difficulty that he could persuade them to go with him. Through marshes and swamps, forests choked with snow, and drenched with incessant rain, they toiled on for four days more, till the wooden walls of Fort Le Bœuf appeared at last, surrounded by fields studded thick with stumps, and half-encircled by the chill current of French Creek, along the banks of which lay more than two hundred canoes, ready to carry troops in the spring. Washington describes Legardeur de Saint-Pierre (san-peaire) as "an elderly gentleman with much the air of a soldier." The letter sent him by Dinwiddie expressed astonishment that his troops should build forts upon lands "so notoriously known to be the property of the Crown of Great Britain." "I must desire you," continued the letter, "to acquaint me by whose authority and instructions you have lately marched from Canada with an armed force, and invaded the King of Great Britain's territories. It becomes my duty to require your peaceable departure; and that you would forbear prosecuting a purpose so interruptive of the harmony and good understanding which His Majesty¹² is desirous to continue and cultivate with the Most Christian King.¹³ I persuade myself you will receive and entertain Major Washington with the candor and politeness natural to your nation; and it will give me the greatest satisfaction if you return him with an answer suitable to my wishes for a very long and lasting peace between us."

Saint-Pierre took three days to frame the answer. In it he said that he should send Dinwiddie's letter to the Marquis Duquesne and wait his orders; and that meanwhile he should remain at his post, according to the commands of his general.

a discovery made by one La Salle, sixty years ago; and the rise of this expedition is to prevent our settling on the river or waters of it."—Washington's Journal.

12. His Majesty.—George II.

13. Most Christian King.—Louis XV.

“I made it my particular care,” so the letter closed, “to receive Mr. Washington with a distinction suitable to your dignity as well as his own quality and great merit.” No form of courtesy had, in fact, been wanting. “He appeared to be extremely complaisant,” says Washington, “though he was exerting every artifice to set our Indians at variance with us. I saw that every stratagem was practiced to win the Half-King to their interest.” Neither gifts nor brandy were spared; and it was only by the utmost pains that Washington could prevent his red allies from staying at the fort, conquered by French blandishments.

After leaving Venango on his return, he found the horses so weak that, to arrive the sooner, he left them and their drivers in charge of Vanbraam and pushed forward on foot, accompanied by Gist alone. Each was wrapped to the throat in an Indian “matchcoat,”¹⁴ with a gun in his hand and a pack at his back. Passing an old Indian hamlet called Murdering Town, they had an adventure which threatened to make good the name. A French Indian, whom they met in the forest, fired at them, pretending that his gun had gone off by chance. They caught him, and Gist would have killed him; but Washington interposed, and they let him go. Then, to escape pursuit from his tribesmen, they walked all night and all the next day. This brought them to the banks of the Alleghany.

They hoped to have found it dead frozen; but it was all alive and turbulent, filled with ice sweeping down the current. They made a raft, shoved out into the stream, and were soon caught hopelessly in the drifting ice. Washington, pushing hard with his setting-pole, was jerked into the freezing river; but caught a log of the raft, and dragged himself out. By no efforts could they reach the farther bank, or regain that which they had left; but they were driven against an island, where they landed, and left the raft to its fate. The night was excessively cold, and Gist’s feet and hands were badly frost-bitten. In the morning, the ice had set, and the river was a solid floor. They crossed it, and succeeded in reaching the house of a trader, on the Monongahela. It was the middle of January when Washington arrived at Williamsburg and made his report to Dinwiddie.

14. Matchcoat.—A coat made of a coarse kind of woolen cloth.

CHAPTER III.

THE WAR IN EUROPE AND AMERICA.

WITH the first opening of spring (1754), a newly raised company of Virginian backwoodsmen, under Captain Trent, hastened across the mountains, and began to build a fort at the confluence of the Monongahela and Alleghany, where Pittsburg now stands; when suddenly they found themselves invested by a host of French and Indians, who, with sixty bateaux¹ and three hundred canoes, had descended from Le Bœuf and Venango. The English were ordered to evacuate the spot; and, being quite unable to resist, they obeyed the summons, and withdrew in great discomfiture towards Virginia. Meanwhile Washington, with another party of backwoodsmen, was advancing from the borders; and, hearing of Trent's disaster, he resolved to fortify himself on the Monongahela, and hold his ground, if possible, until fresh troops could arrive to support him. The French sent out a scouting party under M. Jumonville² (zhu-mon-vill), with the design, probably, of watching his

1. Bateaux.—A light boat, long in proportion to its breadth, and wider in the middle than at the ends.

2. Jumonville.—"The death of Jumonville is one of the trifling events in history which gain from accidental circumstances a startling dramatic effect. It reveals Washington as the leading figure in a petty affray which was the signal for a world-wide conflict, which, opening in a Massachusetts village, rolled on for nearly half a century, involving all civilized nations, and closed at last upon the plains of Waterloo."—Lodge.

movements ; but, on a dark and stormy night, Washington surprised them, as they lay lurking in a rocky glen not far from his camp, killed the officer, and captured the whole detachment. Coolness of judgment, a profound sense of public duty, and a strong self-control, were even then the characteristics of Washington ; but he was scarcely twenty-two, was full of military ardor, and was vehement and fiery by nature. Yet it is far from certain that, even when age and experience had ripened him, he would have forborne to act as he did, for there was every reason for believing that the designs of the French were hostile ; and though by passively waiting the event he would have thrown upon them the responsibility of striking the first blow, he would have exposed his small party to capture or destruction by giving them time to gain re-enforcements from Fort Duquesne (du kane). It was inevitable that the killing of Jumonville should be greeted in France by an outcry of real or assumed horror ; but the Chevalier de Lévis (Lā'vi), second in command to Montcalm, probably expresses the true opinion of Frenchmen best fitted to judge when he calls it “a pretended assassination.”

Judge it as we may, this obscure skirmish began the war that set the world on fire. Learning that the French, enraged by this reverse, were about to attack him in great force, he thought it prudent to fall back, and retired accordingly to a spot called the Great Meadows,³ where he had before thrown up a slight intrenchment. Here he found himself assailed by nine hundred French and Indians. From eleven in the morning till eight at night, the backwoodsmen, who were half famished from the failure of their stores, maintained a stubborn defense, some fighting within the intrenchment, and some on the plain without. In the evening, the French sounded a parley,⁴ and offered terms. They were accepted, and on the

3. Great Meadows.—Wide plains not far from the junction of the Monongahela and Alleghany rivers. The slight intrenchment was named Fort Necessity, from the famine that had prevailed during its construction.

4. Parley. — A conference be-following day Washington and his men retired across the mountains, leaving the disputed territory in the hands of the French.

While the rival nations were beginning to quarrel for a prize which belonged to neither of them, the unhappy Indians saw, with alarm and amazement, their lands becoming a bone of contention between rapacious strangers. The first appearance of the French on the Ohio excited the wildest fears in the tribes of that quarter, among whom were those who, disgusted by the encroachments of the Pennsylvanians, had fled to these remote retreats to escape the intrusions of the white men. Scarcely was their fancied asylum gained, when they saw themselves invaded by a host of armed men from Canada. Thus placed between two fires, they knew not which way to turn. There was no union in their counsels, and they seemed like a mob of bewildered children. Their native jealousy was roused to its utmost pitch. Many of them thought that the two white nations had conspired to destroy them, and then divide their lands. "You and the French," said one of them, a few years afterwards, to an English emissary, "are like the two edges of a pair of shears, and we are the cloth which is cut to pieces between them."

The French labored hard to conciliate them, plying them with gifts and flatteries, and proclaiming themselves their champions against the English. At first, these acts seemed in vain, but their effect soon began to declare itself; and this effect was greatly increased by a singular piece of infatuation on the part of the proprietors of Pennsylvania. During the summer of 1754, delegates of the several provinces met at Albany, to concert measures of defense in the war which now seemed inevitable. It was at this meeting that the memorable plan of a union⁵ of the colonies was brought forward; a plan, the fate of which was curious and significant, for the crown rejected it as tween enemies; a hasty and informal treating between parties prepared for fight.

5. This plan of union was drawn up by Franklin.

giving too much power to the people, and the people as giving too much power to the crown. A council was also held with the Iroquois⁶ (ēro-quah), and though they were found but lukewarm in their attachment to the English, a treaty of friendship and alliance was concluded with their deputies. It would have been well if the matter had ended here; but, with ill-timed rapacity, the proprietary⁷ agents of Pennsylvania took advantage of this great assemblage of sachems to procure from them the grant of extensive tracts, including the lands inhabited by the very tribes whom the French were at that moment striving to seduce. When they heard that, without their consent, their conquerors and tyrants, the Iroquois, had sold the soil from beneath their feet, their indignation was extreme; and, convinced that there was no limit to English encroachment, many of them from that hour became fast allies of the French.

The courts of London and Versailles still maintained a diplomatic intercourse, both protesting their earnest wish that their conflicting claims might be adjusted by friendly negotiation; but while each disclaimed the intention of hostility, both were hastening to prepare for war. Early in 1755, an English fleet sailed from Cork, having on board two regiments destined for Virginia, and commanded by General Braddock; and soon after, a French fleet put to sea from the port of Brest,⁸ freighted with munitions of war and a strong body of troops under Baron Dieskau,⁹ (de-esko). The English fleet gained its destination,

6. Iroquois.—The most powerful combination of Indian nations, and so named by the French.

7. Proprietary Government.—William Penn received from Charles II., in 1681, a tract of land named in his honor Pennsylvania. By the terms of the grant Penn was made proprietor, or governor, and was given power to appoint a deputy governor to act in his stead. The power of the original proprietor was continued to his descendants. This form of proprietary government caused much dissatisfaction among the people.

8. Brest. — In France. Locate it.

9. Baron Dieskau. — A distinguished French commander. In 1755 Dieskau was sent in command of four thousand troops from Brest, and landed its troops in safety. The French were less fortunate. Two of their ships became involved in the fogs of the banks of Newfoundland; and when the weather cleared, they found themselves under the guns of a superior British force, sent out for the express purpose of intercepting them. "Are we at peace or war?" demanded the French commander. A broadside from the Englishman soon solved his doubts, and after a stout resistance the French struck their colors.

Thus began that memorable war which, kindling among the forests of America, scattered its fires over the kingdoms of Europe, and the sultry empire of the Great Mogul;¹⁰ the war made glorious by the heroic death of Wolfe,¹¹ the victories of Frederic,¹² and the exploits of Clive;¹³ the war which controlled the destinies of America, and was first in the chain of events which led on to her Revolution with all its vast and undeveloped consequences. On the old battle-ground of Europe, the contest bore the same familiar features of violence and horror which had marked the strife of former generations—fields plowed by the cannon ball, and walls shattered by the exploding mine, sacked towns, and blazing suburbs. But in America, war assumed a new and striking aspect. A wilderness was its sublime arena. Army met army under the shadows of primeval woods; their cannon resounded over wastes unknown to civilized man. And before the hostile powers could join in battle, endless for-France. An English fleet under Boscawen was sent out to intercept them off Newfoundland. Dieskau landed most of his troops at Louisbourg, and later commanded an expedition against the British near Lake George. In the battle that followed he was mortally wounded.

10. Great Mogul.—The rulers of India after the 16th century were called Moguls. The most famous one, Aurungzebe, was called the Great Mogul,

11. Wolfe, commander of British, killed at the capture of Quebec, Sept. 13, 1759.

12. Frederick the Great, king of Prussia.

13. Clive.—Lord Clive won a series of splendid victories over the French in India, achieving the conquest of Bengal.

ests must be traversed, and morasses passed, and everywhere the ax of the pioneer must hew a path for the bayonet of the soldier.

Before the declaration of war, and before the breaking off of negotiations between the courts of France and England, the English ministry formed the plan of assailing the French in America on all sides at once, and repelling them, by one bold push, from all their encroachments. A provincial army was to advance upon Acadia, a second was to attack Crown Point, and a third Niagara ; while the two regiments which had lately arrived in Virginia under General Braddock, aided by a strong body of provincials, were to dislodge the French from their newly-built fort of Du Quesne.¹⁴ To Braddock was assigned the chief command of all the British forces in America ; and a person worse fitted for the office could scarcely have been found. His experience had been ample, and none could doubt his courage ; but he was profligate, arrogant, perverse, and a bigot to military rules. On his first arrival in Virginia, he called together the governors of the several provinces, in order to explain his instructions and adjust the details of the projected operations.

14. Du Quesne, the governor of Canada. The fort was built by the Ohio Company ; was captured by the French and Indians and completed Recaptured later by the English, and named Fort Pitt. In time it grew to be a town, and is now the city of Pittsburg.

CHAPTER IV.

BRADDOCK.

1755.

“I HAVE the pleasure to acquaint you that General Braddock came to my house last Sunday night,” writes Dinwiddie, at the end of February, to Governor Dobbs¹ of North Carolina. Braddock had landed at Hampton² from the ship “Centurion,” along with young Commodore Keppel, who commanded the American squadron. “I am mighty glad,” again writes Dinwiddie, “that the General is arrived, which I hope will give me some ease; for these twelve months past I have been a perfect slave.” He conceived golden opinions of his guest. “He is, I think, a very fine officer, and a sensible, considerate gentleman. He and I live in great harmony.”

Had he known him better, he might have praised him less. William Shirley, son of the Governor of Massachusetts, was Braddock's secretary; and after an acquaintance of some months wrote to his friend Governor Morris: “We have a general most judiciously chosen for being disqualified for the service he is employed in in almost every respect. He may be brave for aught I know, and he is honest in pecuniary matters.” The astute Franklin, who also had good opportunity of knowing him, says: “This general was, I think, a brave man, and might probably have made a good figure in some European war. But he had too much self-confidence; too high an opinion of the validity of reg-

1. Arthur Dobbs, Governor of
N. C., 1754-1765.

2. Hampton, Virginia.

ular troops; too mean a one of both Americans and Indians."*

Whatever were his failings, he feared nothing, and his fidelity and honor in the discharge of public trusts were never questioned. "Desperate in his fortune, brutal in his behavior, obstinate in his sentiments," writes Walpole,³ "he was still intrepid and capable." He was a veteran in years and in service, having entered the Coldstream Guards as ensign⁴ in 1710.

The transports bringing the two regiments from Ireland all arrived safely at Hampton, and were ordered to proceed up the Potomac to Alexandria,⁵ where a camp was to be formed. Thither, towards the end of March, went Braddock himself, along with Keppel and Dinwiddie, in the Governor's coach; while his aide-de-camp, Orme, his secretary, Shirley, and the servants of the party followed on horseback. Braddock had sent for the elder Shirley and other provincial governors to meet him in council; and on the fourteenth of April they assembled in a tent of the newly formed encampment.

Here was Dinwiddie, who thought his troubles at an end, and saw in the red-coated soldiery the near fruition of his hopes. Here, too, was his friend and ally, Dobbs of North Carolina; with Morris of Pennsylvania; Sharpe of Maryland, who, having once been a soldier, had been made a sort of provisional commander-in-chief before the arrival of Braddock; and the ambitious Delancey of New York, who had lately led the opposition against the Gov-

3. Walpole. — Horace Walpole, 1717-1797, a writer of some distinction.

4. Ensign. — An officer who formerly carried the ensign or flag of a company or regiment.

5. Alexandria, Virginia, on the Potomac River, a few miles from Mount Vernon.

* "Washington soon appreciated Braddock's character. He found him stately and somewhat haughty, exact in matters of military etiquette and discipline, positive in giving an opinion, and obstinate in maintaining it; but of an honorable and generous, though somewhat irritable nature."—Irving's Life of Washington.

ernor of that province, and now filled the office himself,—a position that needed all his manifold adroitness. But, next to Braddock, the most noteworthy man present was Shirley,⁶ governor of Massachusetts. Now, when more than sixty years old, he thirsted for military honors, and delighted in contriving operations of war. He was one of a very few in the colonies who at this time entertained the idea of expelling the French from the continent. He and Lawrence, governor of Nova Scotia, had concerted an attack on the French fort of Beauséjour⁷; and, jointly with others in New England, he had planned the capture of Crown Point, the key of Lake Champlain.

By these two strokes and by fortifying the portage⁸ between the Kennebec and the Chaudière⁹ (sho-de'-air), he thought that the northern colonies would be saved from invasion, and placed in a position to become themselves invaders. Then, by driving the enemy from Niagara, securing that important pass, and thus cutting off the communication between Canada and her interior dependencies, all the French posts in the West would die of inanition.¹⁰ In order to commend these schemes to the Home Government, he had painted in gloomy colors the dangers that beset the British colonies.

The plans against Crown Point and Beauséjour had already found the approval of the Home Government and the energetic

6. Shirley. — The most distinguished of Massachusetts colonial governors (1741–1757); was made commander-in-chief of all the forces in 1756, and commanded the expedition against Fort Niagara.

7. Beauséjour. — A French fort at the head of the Bay of Fundy, captured by British in 1755. The Acadians were dispersed among the British colonies. (Read “Evangeline.”)

8. Portage. — A narrow tract of land between two bodies of navigable water, over which merchandise and boats are carried.

9. Kennebec River, flowing south through (Maine) Mass. territory into the Atlantic; and the Chaudière River, flowing north through Canada into the St. Lawrence River. The head waters of these two rivers were but a few miles apart.

10. Inanition. Starvation.

support of all the New England Colonies. Preparation for them was in full activity ; and it was with great difficulty that Shirley had disengaged himself from these cares to attend the council at Alexandria. He and Dinwiddie stood in the front of opposition to French designs. As they both defended the royal prerogative and were strong advocates of taxation by Parliament, they have found scant justice from American writers. Yet the British colonies owed them a debt of gratitude, and the American States owe it still.

Braddock laid his instructions before the Council, and Shirley found them entirely to his mind ; while the General, on his part, fully approved the schemes of the Governor. The plan of the campaign was settled. The French were to be attacked at four points at once. The two British regiments lately arrived were to advance on Fort Duquesne ; two new regiments, known as Shirley's and Pepperell's, just raised in the provinces, and taken into the King's pay, were to reduce Niagara ; a body of provincials, from New England, New York, and New Jersey was to seize Crown Point ; and another body of New England men to capture Beauséjour and bring Acadia to complete subjection. Braddock himself was to lead the expedition against Fort Duquesne. He asked Shirley, who, though a soldier only in theory, had held the rank of colonel since the last war, to charge himself with that against Niagara ; and Shirley eagerly assented. The movement on Crown Point was entrusted to Colonel William Johnson,¹¹ by reason of his influence over the Indians and his reputation for energy, capacity, and faithfulness. Lastly, the Acadian enterprise was assigned to Lieutenant-Colonel Monckton, a regular officer of merit.

To strike this fourfold blow in time of peace was a scheme

11. William Johnson. — Born in Ireland, came to this country at the age of nineteen, (1734) settled in the valley of the Mohawk, and carried on a prosperous traffic with the Indians. He attained the most powerful influence over the Indians, and was placed in command over the colonial troops at the battle of Lake George. He died in 1774.

worthy of Newcastle¹¹ and of Cumberland¹³. The pretext was that the positions to be attacked were all on British soil ; that in occupying them the French had been guilty of invasion ; and that to expel the invaders would be an act of self-defense. Yet in regard to two of these positions, the French, if they had no other right, might at least claim one of prescription.¹⁴ Crown Point had been twenty-four years in their undisturbed possession, while it was three quarters of a century since they first occupied Niagara ; and, though New York claimed the ground, no serious attempt had been made to dislodge them.

Other matters had now engaged the Council. Braddock, in accordance with his instructions, asked the governors to urge upon their several assemblies the establishment of a general fund for the service of the campaign ; but the governors were all of opinion that the assemblies would refuse,—each being resolved to keep the control of its money in its own hands ; and all present, with one voice, advised that the colonies should be compelled by Act of Parliament to contribute in due proportion to the support of the war. Braddock next asked if, in the judgment of the Council, it would not be well to send Colonel Johnson with full powers to treat with the Five Nations,¹⁵ who had been driven to the verge of an outbreak by the misconduct of the Dutch Indian commissioners at Albany. The measure was cordially approved, as was also another suggestion of the General, that vessels should be built at Oswego to command Lake Ontario. The Council then dissolved.

12. Newcastle. — A prominent member of the British Government. Was made Duke of Newcastle in 1716.

13. Cumberland.—He was the son of George II. Had a famous military career. He defeated the Scotch Highlanders at the battle of Culloden, and for his cruelty there gained the name of The Butcher.

14. Prescription.—A custom long continued till it has the force of law.

15. Five Nations.—The Mohawks, Oneidas, Onondagas, Cayugas and Senecas. These combined nations were called by the French the Iroquois.

Shirley hastened back to New England, burdened with the preparation for three expeditions and the command of one of them. Johnson, who had been in the camp, though not in the Council, went back to Albany, provided with a commission as sole superintendent of Indian affairs, and charged, besides, with the enterprise against Crown Point; while an express was dispatched to Monckton at Halifax, with orders to set at once to his work of capturing Beauséjour.

In regard to Braddock's part of the campaign, there had been a serious error. If, instead of landing in Virginia and moving on Fort Duquesne by the long and circuitous route of Will's Creek the two regiments had disembarked at Philadelphia and marched westward, the way would have been shortened, and would have lain through one of the richest and most populous districts on the continent, filled with supplies of every kind. In Virginia, on the other hand, and in the adjoining province of Maryland, wagons, horses, and forage were scarce. The enemies of the Administration ascribed this blunder to the influence of the Quaker merchant, John Hanbury, whom the Duke of Newcastle had consulted as a person familiar with American affairs. Hanbury, who was a prominent stockholder in the Ohio Company, and who traded largely in Virginia, saw it for his interest that the troops should pass that way; and is said to have brought the Duke to this opinion. A writer of the time thinks that if they had landed in Pennsylvania, forty thousand pounds would have been saved in money, and six weeks in time.

Not only were supplies scarce, but the people showed such unwillingness to furnish them, and such apathy in aiding the expedition, that even Washington was provoked to declare that "they ought to be chastised." Many of them thought that the alarm about French encroachment was a device of designing politicians; and they did not awake to a full consciousness of the peril till it was forced upon them by a deluge of calamities, produced by the purblind folly of their own representatives, who instead of frankly promoting the expedition, displayed a perverse and exasperating narrowness which chafed Braddock to fury. He praises the New England colonies, and echoes Dinwiddie's declaration that they have shown a "fine martial spirit," and he commends Virginia as having done far better than her neighbors; but for Pennsylvania he finds no words to express his wrath. He knew nothing of the intestine¹⁶ war between proprietaries and people, and hence could see no palliation for a conduct which threatened to ruin both the expedition and the colony. Everything depended on speed, and speed was impossible; for stores and provisions were not ready, though notice to furnish them had been given months before. Contracts broken or disavowed, want of horses, want of wagons, want of forage, want of wholesome food, or sufficient food of any kind, caused such delay that the report of it reached England, and drew from Walpole the comment that Braddock was in no hurry to be scalped. In reality he was maddened with impatience and vexation.

CHAPTER V.

THE SERVICE OF FRANKLIN. THE MARCH THROUGH THE FOREST.

A POWERFUL ally presently came to his aid in the shape of Benjamin Franklin, then postmaster-general of Pennsylvania. That sagacious personage,—the sublime of common-sense, about equal in his instincts and motives of character to the respectable

16. Intestine War. — There was much complaint in Pennsylvania because of the proprietary form of government. Part of the land had been reserved to Wm. Penn's sons and as the colony grew older the people became more and more discontented with the payment of rents. There were many disputes between the proprietors and the people, and during the Revolution the State abolished the rents, paying the proprietors $650,000 for them.

average of the New England that produced him, but gifted with a versatile power of brain rarely matched on earth,—was then divided between his strong desire to repel a danger of which he saw the imminence, and his equally strong antagonism to the selfish claims of the Penns, proprietaries of Pennsylvania. This last motive had determined his attitude towards their representative, the Governor, and led him into an opposition as injurious to the military good name of the province as it was favorable to its political longings.

In the present case there was no such conflict of inclinations; he could help Braddock without hurting Pennsylvania. He and his son had visited the camp, and found the General waiting restlessly for the report of the agents whom he had sent to collect wagons. “I stayed with him,” says Franklin, “several days, and dined with him daily. When I was about to depart, the returns of wagons to be obtained were brought in, by which it appeared that they amounted only to twenty-five, and not all of these were in serviceable condition.” On this the General and his officers declared that the expedition was at an end, and denounced the Ministry for sending them into a country void of the means of transportation. Franklin remarked that it was a pity they had not landed in Pennsylvania, where almost every farmer had his wagon. Braddock caught eagerly at his words, and begged that he would use his influence to enable the troops to move. Franklin went back to Pennsylvania, issued an address to the farmers appealing to their interest and their fears, and in a fortnight procured a hundred and fifty wagons, with a large number of horses. Braddock, grateful to his benefactor, and enraged at everybody else, pronounced him “Almost the only instance of ability and honesty I have known in these provinces.” More wagons and more horses gradually arrived, and at the eleventh hour the march began.

On the tenth of May Braddock reached Will's Creek,¹ where

1. Will's Creek—A small stream running into the Potomac River on the banks of which was erected the Fort Cumberland, a former trading station.

the whole force was now gathered, having marched thither by detachments along the banks of the Potomac. This old trading-station of the Ohio Company had been transformed into a military post and named Fort Cumberland. During the past winter the independent companies which had failed Washington in his need had been at work here to prepare a base of operations for Braddock. Their axes had been of more avail than their muskets. A broad wound had been cut in the bosom of the forest, and the murdered oaks and chestnuts turned into rampart, barracks, and magazines. Fort Cumberland was an inclosure of logs set upright in the ground, pierced with loopholes, and armed with ten small cannon. It stood on a rising ground near the point where Will's Creek joined the Potomac, and the forest girded it like a mighty hedge, or rather like a paling of gaunt brown stems upholding a canopy of green. All around spread illimitable woods, wrapping hill, valley, and mountain. The spot was an oasis in a desert of leaves,—if the name oasis can be given to anything so rude and harsh.

In this rugged area, or “clearing,” all Braddock's force was now assembled, amounting, regulars, provincials, and sailors, to about twenty-two hundred men. The two regiments, Halket's and Dunbar's, had been completed by enlistment in Virginia to seven hundred men each. Of Virginians there were nine companies of fifty men, who found no favor in the eyes of Braddock or his officers. To Ensign Allen of Halket's regiment was assigned the duty of “making them as much like soldiers as possible,”—that is, of drilling them like regulars. The General had little hope of them, and informed Sir Thomas Robinson that “their slothful and languid disposition renders them very unfit for military service,”—a point on which he lived to change his mind. Thirty sailors, whom Commodore Keppel had lent him, were more to his liking, and were in fact of value in many ways. He had now about six hundred baggage-horses, besides those of the artillery, all weakening daily on their diet of leaves; for no grass was to be found. There was great show of discipline, and little real order. Braddock's executive capacity seems to have been moderate, and his dogged, imperious temper, rased by disappointments, was in constant irritation. "He looks upon the country, I believe," writes Washington, "as void of honor or honesty. We have frequent disputes on this head, which are maintained with warmth on both sides, especially on his, as he is incapable of arguing without it, or giving up any point he asserts, be it ever so incompatible with reason or common-sense."

Braddock's secretary, the younger Shirley, writing to his friend Governor Morris, spoke thus irreverently of his chief: "As the King said of a neighboring governor of yours [Sharpe], when proposed for the command of the American forces about a twelvemonth ago, and recommended as a very honest man, though not remarkably able, 'a little more ability and a little less honesty upon the present occasion might serve our turn better.' It is a joke to suppose that secondary officers can make amends for the defects of the first; the main-spring must be the mover. As to the others, I don't think we have much to boast; some are insolent and ignorant, others capable, but rather aiming at showing their own abilities than making a proper use of them. I have a very great love for my friend Orme, and think it uncommonly fortunate for our leader that he is under the influence of so honest and capable a man; but I wish for the sake of the public he had some more experience of business, particularly in America. I am greatly disgusted at seeing an expedition, so ill-concerted originally in England, so improperly conducted since in America."

Captain Robert Orme, of whom Shirley speaks, was aide-de-camp to Braddock, and author of a copious and excellent Journal of the expedition, now in the British Museum. His portrait, painted at full length by Sir Joshua Reynolds,² hangs in the National Gallery at London. He stands by his horse, a gallant young figure, with a face pale, yet rather handsome, booted to the knee, his scarlet coat, ample waistcoat, and small three-cornered hat all heavy with gold lace. The General had two other aides-de-camp, Captain Roger Morris and Colonel George Washington, whom he had invited, in terms that do him honor, to become one of his military family.*

2. Sir Joshua Reynolds, generally placed at the head of the English school of painting, was born in England in 1723. His portraits were of unsurpassed merit. He died in 1784.

It has been said that Braddock despised not only provincials, but Indians. Nevertheless he took some pains to secure their aid, and complained that Indian affairs had been so ill-conducted by the provinces that it was hard to gain their confidence. This was true ; the tribes had been alienated by gross neglect. Had they been protected from injustice and soothed by attentions and presents, the Five Nations, Delawares, and Shawanoes would have been retained as friends. But their complaints had been slighted, and every gift begrudged.

The trader Croghan brought, however, about fifty warriors, with as many women and children, to the camp at Fort Cumberland. They were objects of great curiosity to the soldiers, who gazed with astonishment on their faces, painted red, yellow, and black, their ears slit and hung with pendants, and their heads close shaved, except the feathered scalp-lock at the crown.

* “ The din and stir of warlike preparations disturbed the quiet of Mount Vernon. Washington looked down from his rural retreat upon the ships of war and transports, as they passed up the Potomac, with the array of arms gleaming along their decks. The booming of cannon echoed among his groves. Alexandria was but a few miles distant. Occasionally he mounted his horse and rode to that place; it was like a garrisoned town, teeming with troops, and resounding with the drum and fife. A brilliant campaign was about to open under the auspices of an experienced general, and with all the means and appurtenances of European warfare. How different from the starveling expeditions he had hitherto been doomed to conduct ! What an opportunity to efface the memory of his recent disaster ! All his thoughts of rural life were put to flight. The military part of his character was again in the ascendant; his great desire was to join the expedition as a volunteer.

“ It was reported to General Braddock. The latter was apprised by Governor Dinwiddie and others, of Washington's personal merits, his knowledge of the country, and his experience in frontier service. The consequence was a letter from one of Braddock's aides-de-camp, inviting Washington to join his staff.”—Irving's Life of Washington.

“In the day,” says an officer, “they are in our camp, and in the night they go into their own, where they dance and make a most horrible noise.”

Braddock received them several times in his tent, ordered the guard to salute them, made them speeches, caused cannon to be fired and drums and fifes to play in their honor, regaled them with rum, and gave them a bullock for a feast; whereupon, being much pleased, they danced a war-dance, described by one spectator as “droll and odd, showing how they scalp and fight;” after which, says another, “they set up the most horrid song or cry that ever I heard.” These warriors, with a few others, promised the General to join him on the march; but he apparently grew tired of them, for a famous chief, called Scarroyaddy, afterwards complained: “He looked upon us as dogs, and would never hear anything that we said to him.” Only eight of them remained with him to the end.

Another ally appeared at the camp. This was a personage long known in Western fireside story as Captain Jack, the Black Hunter, or the Black Rifle. It was said of him that, having been a settler on the farthest frontier, in the Valley of the Juniata, he returned one evening to his cabin and found it burned to the ground by Indians, and the bodies of his wife and children lying among the ruins. He vowed undying vengeance, raised a band of kindred spirits, dressed and painted like Indians, and became the scourge of the red man and the champion of the white. But he and his wild crew, useful as they might have been, shocked Braddock's sense of military fitness; and he received them so coldly that they left him.

It was the tenth of June before the army was well on its march. Three hundred axmen led the way, to cut and clear the road; and the long train of packhorses, wagons, and cannon toiled on behind, over the stumps, roots, and stones of the narrow track, the regulars and provincials marching in the forest close on either side. Squads of men were thrown out on the flanks, and scouts ranged the woods to guard against surprise; for, with all his scorn of Indians and Canadians, Braddock did not neglect reasonable precautions.

Thus, foot by foot, they advanced into the waste of lonely mountains that divided the streams flowing to the Atlantic from those flowing to the Gulf of Mexico, —a realm of forests ancient as the world. The road was but twelve feet wide, and the line of march often extended four miles. It was like a thin, long party-colored snake, red, blue, and brown, trailing slowly through the depth of leaves, creeping round inaccessible heights, crawling over ridges, moving always in dampness and shadow, by rivulets and waterfalls, crags and chasms, gorges and shaggy steeps. In glimpses only, through jagged boughs and flickering leaves, did this wild primeval world reveal itself, with its dark green mountains, flecked with the morning mist, and its distant summits penciled in dreamy blue.

The army passed the main Alleghany, Meadow Mountain, and Great Savage Mountain, and traversed the funereal pine-forest afterwards called the Shades of Death. No attempt was made to interrupt their march, though the commandant of Fort Duquesne had sent out parties for that purpose. A few French and Indians hovered about them, now and then scalping a straggler or inscribing filthy insults on trees ; while others fell upon the border settlements which the advance of the troops had left defenceless. Here they were more successful, butchering about thirty persons, chiefly women and children.

CHAPTER VI.

FORT DUQUESNE. THE CRISIS NEAR.

It was the eighteenth of June before the army reached a place called the Little Meadows, less than thirty miles from Fort Cumberland. Fever and dysentery among the men, and the weakness and worthlessness of many of the horses, joined to the extreme difficulty of the road, so retarded them that they could move scarcely more than three miles a day. Braddock consulted with Washington, who advised him to leave the heavy baggage to follow as it could, and push forward with a body of chosen troops.

This counsel was given in view of a report that five hundred régulars were on the way to re-enforce Fort Duquesne. It was adopted. Colonel Dunbar was left to command the rear division, whose powers of movement were now reduced to the lowest point. The advance corps, consisting of about twelve hundred soldiers, besides officers and drivers, began its march on the nineteenth with such artillery as was thought indispensable, thirty wagons, and a large number of packhorses. "The prospect," writes Washington to his brother, "conveyed infinite delight to my mind, though I was excessively ill at the time. But this prospect was soon clouded, and my hopes brought very low indeed when I found that, instead of pushing on with vigor without regarding a little rough road, they were halting to level every mole-hill, and to erect bridges over every brook, by which means we were four days in getting twelve miles." It was not till the seventh of July that they neared the mouth of Turtle Creek, a stream entering the Monongahela¹ about eight miles from the French fort. The way was direct and short, but would lead through a difficult country and a defile so perilous that Braddock resolved to ford the Monongahela to avoid this danger, and then ford it again to reach his destination.

1. Monongahela.—Locate this river on the map.

Fort Duquesne stood on the point of land where the Alleghany and the Monongahela join to form the Ohio, and where now stands Pittsburg, with its swarming population, its restless industries, the clang of its forges, and chimneys vomiting foul smoke into the face of heaven. At that early day a white flag fluttering over a cluster of palisades and embankments betokened the first intrusion of civilized men upon a scene which, a few months before, breathed the repose of a virgin wilderness, voiceless but for the lapping of waves upon the pebbles, or the note of some lonely bird. But now the sleep of ages was broken, and bugle and drum told the astonished forest that its doom was pronounced and its days numbered.

The fort was a compact little work, solidly built and strong, compared with others on the continent. It was a square of four bastions,² with the water close on two sides, and the other two protected by ravelins,³ ditch, glacis,⁴ and covered way. The ramparts⁵ on these sides were of squared logs, filled in with earth, and ten feet or more thick. The two water sides were inclosed by a massive stockade⁶ of upright logs, twelve feet high, mortised together and loopholed. The armament consisted of a number of small cannon mounted on the bastions.

A gate and drawbridge on the east side gave access to the area within, which was surrounded by barracks for the soldiers, officers' quarters, the lodgings of the commandant, a guard-house, and a storehouse, all built partly of logs and partly of

2. Bastions --A portion of a fortress projecting from the main fort.

3. Ravelins.--A rampart, wall. A detached work with two embankments.

4. Glacis. -- A mass of earth which serves as a parapet to the covered way in a fortress.

5. Ramparts.--The entire mound or wall which surrounds a fortified place.

6. Stockade.--A line of posts or stakes set in the ground as a barrier. A slight fortification.

boards. There were no casemates,⁷ and the place was commanded by a high woody hill beyond the Monongahela. The forest had been cleared away to the distance of more than a musket shot from the ramparts, and the stumps were hacked level with the ground. Here, just outside the ditch, bark cabins had been built for such of the troops and Canadians as could not find room within; and the rest of the open space was covered with Indian corn and other crops.

The garrison consisted of a few companies of the regular troops stationed permanently in the colony, and to these were added a considerable number of Canadians. Besides the troops and Canadians, eight hundred Indian warriors, mustered from far and near, had built their wigwams and camp-sheds on the open ground, or under the edge of the neighboring woods,—very little to the advantage of the young corn. Some were baptized savages settled in Canada. The rest were unmitigated heathen.

The law of the survival of the fittest had wrought on this heterogeneous crew through countless generations; and with the primitive Indian, the fittest was the hardest, fiercest, most adroit, and most wily. Baptized and heathen alike, they had just enjoyed a diversion greatly to their taste. A young Pennsylvanian named James Smith, a spirited and intelligent boy of eighteen, had been waylaid by three Indians on the western borders of the province and led captive to the fort. When the party came to the edge of the clearing, his captors, who had shot and scalped his companion, raised the scalp-yell; whereupon a din of responsive whoops and firing of guns rose from all the Indian camps, and their inmates swarmed out like bees, while the French in the fort shot off muskets and cannon to honor the occasion. The unfortunate boy, the object of this obstreperous rejoicing, presently saw a multitude of savages, naked, hideously bedaubed with red, blue, black, and brown, and armed with sticks or clubs, ranging themselves in two long parallel lines, between which he was told that he must run, the faster the better, as they would beat him all the way. He ran with his best speed, under a shower of blows, and had nearly reached the end of the course, when he was knocked down. He tried to rise, but was blinded by a handful of sand thrown into his face; and then they beat him till he swooned. On coming to his senses he found himself in the fort, with the surgeon opening a vein in his arm and a crowd of French and Indians looking on. In a few days he was able to walk with the help of a stick; and, coming out from his quarters one morning, he saw a memorable scene.

7. Casemates.—Bomb-proof chambers, usually of masonry in which cannon may be placed.

Three days before, an Indian had brought the report that the English were approaching; the French were in great excitement and alarm; it was determined to meet the enemy on the march, and ambuscade them if possible at the crossing of the Monongahela, or some other favorable spot. Beaujeu⁸ proposed the plan to the Indians, and offered them the war-hatchet;⁹ but they would not take it. "Do you want to die, my father, and sacrifice us besides?" That night they held a council, and in the morning again refused to go. Beaujeu did not despair. "I am determined," he exclaimed, "to meet the English. What! will you let your father go alone?" The greater part caught fire at his words, promised to follow him, and put on their war-paint. Beaujeu received the communion, then dressed himself like a savage, and joined the clamorous throng.

Open barrels of gunpowder and bullets were set before the gate of the fort, and James Smith, painfully climbing the rampart with the help of his stick, looked down on the warrior rabble as, huddling together, wild with excitement, they scooped up the contents to fill their powder-horns and pouches. Then, band after band, they filed off along the forest track that led to the ford of the Monongahela.

8. Beaujeu.—One of the French commanders of Fort Du Quesne.

9. War hatchet.—The tomahawk used by the American Indians. It was originally made of stone, but afterwards of iron. Used as a symbol for declaration of war.

They numbered six hundred and thirty-seven ; and with them went thirty-six French officers and cadets, seventy-two regular soldiers, and a hundred and forty-six Canadians, or about nine hundred in all. At eight o'clock the tumult was over. The broad clearing lay lonely and still, and Contrecoeur, with what was left of his garrison, waited in suspense for the issue.

It was near one o'clock when Braddock crossed the Monongahela for the second time. If the French made a stand anywhere, it would be, he thought, at the fording-place ; but Lieutenant-Colonel Gage, whom he sent across with a strong advance-party, found no enemy, and quietly took possession of the farther shore. Then the main body followed. To impose on the imagination of the French scouts, who were doubtless on the watch, the movement was made with studied regularity and order. The sun was cloudless, and the men were inspirited by the prospect of near triumph. Washington afterwards spoke with admiration of the spectacle. The music, the banners, the mounted officers, the troop of light cavalry, the naval detachment, the red-coated regulars, the blue-coated Virginians, the wagons and tumbrils,¹⁰ cannon, howitzers,¹¹ and coehorns,¹² the train of pack-horses, and the droves of cattle, passed in long procession through the rippling shallows, and slowly entered the bordering forest. Here, when all were over, a short halt was ordered for rest and refreshment.

Why had not Beaujeu defended the ford ? This was his intention in the morning ; but he had been met by obstacles, the nature of which is not wholly clear. His Indians, it seems, had proved refractory. Three hundred of them left him, went off in another direction, and did not rejoin him till the English had crossed the river. Hence perhaps it was that, having left Fort Duquesne at eight o'clock, he spent half the day in marching

10. Tumbrils.—Rough wagons for conveying cartridges, and the like.

11. Howitzers.—A short, light cannon.

12. Coehorns.—A small bronze mortar, so named from its inventor, Baron Coehorn.

seven miles, and was more than a mile from the fording-place when the British reached the eastern shore. The delay, from whatever cause arising, cost him the opportunity of laying an ambush either at the ford or in the gullies and ravines that channeled the forest through which Braddock was now on the point of marching.

Not far from the bank of the river, and close by the British line of march, there was a clearing and a deserted house that had once belonged to a trader. Washington remembered it well. It was here that he found rest and shelter on the winter journey homeward from his mission to Fort Le Bœuf.* He was in no less need of rest at this moment ; for recent fever had so weakened him that he could hardly sit his horse. From the trader's house to Fort Duquesne the distance was eight miles by a rough path, along which the troops were now beginning to move after their halt. It ran inland for a little ; then curved to the left, and followed a course parallel to the river along the base of a line of steep hills that here bordered the valley. These and all the country were buried in dense and heavy forest, choked with bushes and the carcasses of fallen trees.

CHAPTER VII.

THE BATTLE. THE RETREAT.

BRADDOCK has been charged with marching blindly into an ambuscade ; but it was not so. There was no ambuscade ; and had there been one, he would have found it. It is true that he did not reconnoitre the woods very far in advance of the head of the column ; yet, with this exception, he made elaborate dispositions to prevent surprise. Several guides, with six Virginian light horsemen, led the way. Then, a musket-shot behind, came the vanguard ; then three hundred soldiers under Gage ; then a large body of axmen, under Sir John Sinclair, to open the road ; then two cannon with tumbrils and tool-wagons ; and lastly the rear-guard, closing the line, while flanking-parties ranged the woods on both sides. This was the advance-column.

The main body followed with little or no interval. The artillery and wagons moved along the road, and the troops filed through the woods close on either hand. Numerous flanking-parties were thrown out a hundred yards and more to right and left ; while, in the space between them and the marching column, the pack horses and cattle, with their drivers, made their way painfully among the trees and thickets ; since, had they been allowed to follow the road, the line of march would have been too long for mutual support. A body of regulars and provincials brought up the rear.

Gage, with his advance-column, had just passed a wide and bushy ravine that crossed their path, and the van of the main column was on the point of entering it, when the guides and light horsemen in the front suddenly fell back ; and the engineer, Gordon, then engaged in marking out the road, saw a man, dressed like an Indian, but wearing the gorget¹ of an officer, bounding forward along the path. He stopped when he discovered the head of the column, turned, and waved his hat. The forest behind was swarming with French and savages. At the signal of the officer, who was probably Beaujeu, they yelled the war-whoop, spread themselves to right and left, and opened a sharp fire under cover of the trees. Gage's column wheeled deliberately into line, and fired several volleys with great steadiness against the now invisible assailants. Few of them were hurt; the trees caught the shot, but the noise was deafening under the dense arches of the forest.

1. Gorget.--A pendent, metallic ornament, worn by officers when on duty.

The greater part of the Canadians "fled shamefully, crying 'Sauve qui peut!'"² Volley followed volley, and at the third Beaujeu dropped dead. Gage's two cannon were now brought to bear, on which the Indians, like the Canadians, gave way in confusion, but did not, like them, abandon the field. The close scarlet ranks of the English were plainly to be seen through the trees and the smoke; they were moving forward, cheering lustily, and shouting "God save the King!" Dumas, now chief in command, thought that all was lost. "I advanced," he says, "with the assurance that comes from despair, exciting by voice and gesture the few soldiers that remained. The fire of my platoon was so sharp that the enemy seemed astonished."

The Indians, encouraged, began to rally. The French officers who commanded them showed admirable courage and address; and while Dumas and Ligneris, with the regulars and what was left of the Canadians, held the ground in front, the savage warriors, screeching their war-cries, swarmed through the forest along both flanks of the English, hid behind trees, bushes, and fallen trunks, or crouched in gullies and ravines, and opened a deadly fire on the helpless soldiery, who, themselves completely visible, could see no enemy, and wasted volley after volley on the impassive trees. The most destructive fire came from a hill on the English right, where the Indians lay in multitudes, firing from their lurking-places on the living target below. But the invisible death was everywhere, in front, flank, and rear. The British cheer was heard no more. The troops broke their ranks and huddled together in a bewildered mass, shrinking from the bullets that cut them down by scores.

2. Sauve qui peut — "Save himself who can."

When Braddock heard the firing in the front, he pushed forward with the main body to the support of Gage, leaving four hundred men in the rear, under Sir Peter Halket, to guard the baggage. At the moment of his arrival Gage's soldiers had abandoned their two cannon, and were falling back to escape the concentrated fire of the Indians. Meeting the advancing troops, they tried to find cover behind them. This threw the whole into confusion. The men of the two regiments became mixed together; and in a short time the entire force, except the Virginians and the troops left with Halket, were massed in several dense bodies within a small space of ground, facing some one way and some another, and all alike exposed without shelter to the bullets that pelted them like hail. Both men and officers were new to this blind and frightful warfare of the savage in his native woods.

To charge the Indians in their hiding-places would have been useless. They would have eluded pursuit with the agility of wildcats, and swarmed back, like angry hornets, the moment that it ceased. The Virginians alone were equal to the emergency. Fighting behind trees like the Indians themselves, they might have held the enemy in check till order could be restored, had not Braddock, furious at a proceeding that shocked all his ideas of courage and discipline, ordered them, with oaths, to form into line. A body of them under Captain Waggoner made a dash for a fallen tree lying in the woods, far out towards the lurking-places of the Indians, and, crouching behind the huge trunk, opened fire; but the regulars, seeing the smoke among the bushes, mistook their best friends for the enemy, shot at them from behind, killed many, and forced the rest to return. A few of the regulars also tried in their clumsy way to fight behind trees; but Braddock beat them with his sword, and compelled them to stand with the rest, an open mark for the Indians.

The panic increased ; the soldiers crowded together, and the bullets spent themselves in a mass of human bodies. Commands, entreaties, and threats were lost upon them. "We would fight," some of them answered, "if we could see anybody to fight with." Nothing was visible but puffs of smoke. Officers and men who had stood all the afternoon under fire afterwards declared that they could not be sure they had seen a single Indian.

Braddock ordered Lieutenant Colonel Burton to attack the hill where the puffs of smoke were thickest, and the bullets most deadly. With infinite difficulty that brave officer induced a hundred men to follow him ; but he was soon disabled by a wound, and they all faced about. The artillerymen stood for some time by their guns, which did great damage to the trees and little to the enemy.

The mob of soldiers, stupefied with terror, stood panting, their foreheads beaded with sweat, loading and firing mechanically, sometimes into the air, sometimes among their own comrades, many of whom they killed. The ground, strewn with dead and wounded men, the bounding of maddened horses, the clatter and roar of musketry and cannon, mixed with the spiteful report of rifles and the yells that rose from the indefatigable throats of six hundred unseen savages, formed a chaos of anguish and terror scarcely paralleled even in Indian war. "I cannot describe the horrors of that scene," one of Braddock's officers wrote three weeks after ; "no pen could do it. The yell of the Indians is fresh on my ear, and the terrific sound will haunt me till the hour of my dissolution."

Braddock showed a furious intrepidity. Mounted on horseback, he dashed to and fro, storming like a madman. Four horses were shot under him, and he mounted a fifth. Washington seconded his chief with equal courage ; he too no doubt using strong language, for he did not measure words when the fit was on him. He escaped as by miracle. Two horses were killed under him, and four bullets tore his clothes. The conduct of the British officers was above praise. Nothing could surpass their undaunted self-devotion ; and in their vain attempts to lead on the men, the havoc among them was frightful. Sir Peter Halket was shot dead. His son, a lieutenant in his regiment, stooping to raise the body of his father, was shot dead in turn. Young Shirley, Braddock's secretary, was pierced through the brain. Orme and Morris, his aides-de-camp, Sinclair, the quartermaster-general, Gates and Gage, both afterwards conspicuous on opposite sides in the War of the Revolution, and Gladwin, who, eight years later, defended Detroit against Pontiac, were all wounded. Of eighty-six officers, sixty-three were killed or disabled ; while out of thirteen hundred and seventy-three non-commissioned officers and privates, only four hundred and fifty-nine came off unharmed.

Braddock saw that all was lost. To save the wreck of his force from annihilation, he at last commanded a retreat ; and as he and such of his officers as were left strove to withdraw the half-frenzied crew in some semblance of order, a bullet struck him down. The gallant bulldog fell from his horse, shot through the arm into the lungs. It is said, though on evidence of no weight, that the bullet came from one of his own men. Be this as it may, there he lay among the bushes, bleeding, gasping, unable even to curse. He demanded to be left where he was. Captain Stewart and another provincial bore him between them to the rear.

It was about this time that the mob of soldiers, having been three hours under fire, and having spent their ammunition, broke away in a blind frenzy, rushed back towards the ford, "and when," says Washington, "we endeavored to rally them, it was with as much success as if we had attempted to stop the wild bears of the mountains." They dashed across, helter-skelter, plunging through the water to the farther bank, leaving wounded comrades, cannon, baggage, the military chest, and the General's papers, a prey to the Indians. About fifty of these followed to the edge of the river. Dumas and Ligneris, who had now only about twenty Frenchmen with them, made no attempt to pursue, and went back to the fort, because, says Contrecoeur, so many of the Canadians had "retired at the first fire." The field, abandoned to the savages, was a pandemonium of pillage and murder.

James Smith, the young prisoner at Fort Duquesne, had passed a day of suspense, waiting the result. "In the afternoon I again observed a great noise and commotion in the fort, and, though at that time I could not understand French, I found it was the voice of joy and triumph, and feared that they had received what I called bad news. I had observed some of the old-country soldiers speak Dutch; as I spoke Dutch, I went to one of them and asked him what was the news. He told me that a runner had just arrived who said that Braddock would certainly be defeated; that the Indians and French had surrounded him, and were concealed behind trees and in gullies, and kept a constant fire upon the English; and that they saw the English falling in heaps; and if they did not take the river, which was the only gap, and make their escape, there would not be one man left alive before sundown.

"Some time after this, I heard a number of scalp-halloos, and saw a company of Indians and French coming in. I observed they had a great number of bloody scalps, grenadiers' caps, British canteens, bayonets, etc., with them. They brought the news that Braddock was defeated. After that another company came in, which appeared to be about one hundred, and chiefly Indians; and it seemed to me that almost every one of this company was carrying scalps. After this came another company with a number of wagon-horses, and also a great many scalps. Those that were coming in and those that had arrived kept up a constant firing of small-arms, and also the great guns in the fort, which were accompanied with the most hideous shouts and yells from all quarters, so that it appeared to me as though the infernal regions had broke loose.

"About sundown I beheld a small party coming in with about a dozen prisoners, stripped naked, with their hands tied behind their backs and their faces and part of their bodies blacked; these prisoners they burned to death on the bank of the Alleghany River, opposite the fort. I stood on the fort wall until I beheld them begin to burn one of these men; they had him tied to a stake, and kept touching him with firebrands, red-hot irons, etc., and he screaming in a most doleful manner, the Indians in the meantime yelling like infernal spirits. As this scene appeared too shocking for me to behold, I retired to my lodging, both sore and sorry. When I came into my lodgings I saw Russel's Seven Sermons, which they had brought from the field of battle, which a Frenchman made a present of to me."

The loss of the French was slight, but fell chiefly on the officers, three of whom were killed, and four wounded. Of the regular soldiers, all but four escaped untouched. The Canadians suffered still less, in proportion to their numbers, only five of them being hurt. The Indians, who won the victory, bore the principal loss. Of those from Canada, twenty-seven were killed and wounded; while the casualties among the Western tribes are not reported. All of these last went off the next morning with their plunder and scalps, leaving Contrecoeur in great anxiety lest the remnant of Braddock's troops, re-enforced by the division under Dunbar, should attack him again. His doubts would have vanished had he known the condition of his defeated enemy.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE DEATH OF BRADDOCK. THE INDIAN WAR.

IN the pain and languor of a mortal wound, Braddock showed unflinching resolution. His bearers stopped with him at a favorable spot beyond the Monongahela; and here he hoped to maintain his position till the arrival of Dunbar.¹ By the efforts of the officers about a hundred men were collected around him; but to keep them there was impossible. Within an hour they abandoned him, and fled like the rest. Gage, however, succeeded in rallying about eighty beyond the other fording-place; and Washington, on an order from Braddock, spurred his jaded horse towards the camp of Dunbar to demand wagons, provisions, and hospital stores.

Fright overcame fatigue. The fugitives toiled on all night, pursued by specters of horror and despair; hearing still the war-whoops and the shrieks; possessed with the one thought of escape from this wilderness of death. In the morning some order was restored. Braddock was placed on a horse; then, the pain being insufferable, he was carried on a litter, Captain Orme having bribed the carriers by the promise of a guinea and a bottle of rum apiece. Early in the succeeding night, such as had not fainted on the way reached the deserted farm of Gist. Here they met wagons and provisions, with a detachment of soldiers sent by Dunbar, whose camp was six miles farther on; and Braddock ordered them to go to the relief of the stragglers left behind.

At noon of that day a number of wagoners and packhorse-drivers had come to Dunbar's camp with wild tidings of rout and ruin. More fugitives followed; and soon after a wounded officer was brought in upon a sheet. The drums beat to arms. The camp was in commotion; and many soldiers and teamsters took to flight, in spite of the sentinels, who tried in vain to stop them.

There was a still more disgraceful scene on the next day, after Braddock, with the wreck of his force, had arrived. Orders were given to destroy such of the wagons, stores, and ammunition as could not be carried back at once to Fort Cumberland. Whether Dunbar or the dying General gave these orders is not clear; but it is certain that they were executed with shameful alacrity. More than a hundred wagons were burned; cannon, coehorns, and shells were burst or buried; barrels of gunpowder were staved, and the contents thrown into a brook; provisions were scattered through the woods and swamps. Then the whole command began its retreat over the mountains to Fort Cumberland, sixty miles distant. This proceeding, for which, in view of the condition of Braddock, Dunbar must be held answerable, excited the utmost indignation among the colonists. If he could not advance, they thought, he might at least have fortified himself and held his ground till the provinces could send him help; thus covering the frontier, and holding French war-parties in check.

1. Dunbar, Thomas, British officer. Joined Braddock's expedition and, when Braddock pressed on to the attack on Fort Du Quesne, was left in charge of the residue of the army. After the defeat Dunbar destroyed his artillery, burned stores and baggage worth £100,000, and ignominiously retreated.

Braddock's last moment was near. Orme, who, though himself severely wounded, was with him till his death, told Franklin that he was totally silent all the first day, and at night said only, "Who would have thought it?" that all the next day he was again silent, till at last he muttered, "We shall better know how to deal with them another time," and died a few minutes after. He had nevertheless found breath to give orders at Gist's for the succor of the men who had dropped on the road. It is said, too, that in his last hours "he could not bear the sight of a red coat," but murmured praises of "the blues," or Virginians, and said that he hoped he should live to reward them. He died at about eight o'clock in the evening of Sunday, the thirteenth. Dunbar had begun his retreat that morning, and was then encamped near the Great Meadows. On Monday the dead commander was buried in the road; and men, horses, and wagons passed over his grave, effacing every sign of it, lest the Indians should find and mutilate the body.*

Colonel James Innes, commanding at Fort Cumberland, where a crowd of invalids with soldiers' wives and other women had been left when the expedition marched, heard of the defeat,

* "Reproach spared him not, even when in his grave. The failure of the expedition was attributed, both in England and America, to his obstinacy, only two days after it happened, from a wagoner who had fled from the field on horseback. He at once sent a note of six lines to Lord Fairfax :² “ I have this moment received the most melancholy news of the defeat of our troops, the General killed, and numbers of our officers ; our whole artillery taken. In short, the account I have received is so very bad, that as, please God, I intend to make a stand here, ’t is highly necessary to raise the militia everywhere to defend the frontiers.” A boy whom he sent out on horseback met more fugitives, and came back on the fourteenth with reports as vague and disheartening as the first. Innes sent them to Dinwiddie. Some days after, Dunbar and his train arrived in miserable disorder, and Fort Cumberland was turned into a hospital for the shattered fragments of a routed and ruined army.

The evil tidings quickly reached Philadelphia, where such confidence had prevailed that certain over-zealous persons had begun to collect money for fireworks to celebrate the victory. Two of these, brother physicians named Bond, came to Franklin and asked him to subscribe ; but the sage looked doubtful. He reminded them that war is always uncertain ; and the subscription was deferred. The Governor laid the news of the disaster before his Council, telling them at the same time that his opponents in the Assembly would not believe it, and had insulted him in the street for giving it currency.

his technical pedantry, and his military conceit. He had been continually warned to be on his guard. Still his dauntless conduct on the field of battle shows him to have been a man of fearless spirit ; and he was universally allowed to be an accomplished disciplinarian. His melancholy end, too, disarms censure of its asperity. Whatever may have been his faults and errors, he in a manner expiated them by the hardest lot that can befall a brave soldier ambitious of renown—an unhonored grave in a strange land, a memory clouded by misfortune, and a name forever coupled with defeat.”—Irving's Life of Washington.

2. Lord Fairfax had resided in Virginia for a long time, and was one of the largest land-owners in that colony. He was very prominent in affairs of state. He was a strong friend to Washington, and did much to forward his interests when he was a young man.

Dinwiddie remained tranquil at Williamsburg, sure that all would go well. The brief note of Innes, forwarded by Lord Fairfax, first disturbed his dream of triumph ; but on second thought he took comfort. "I am willing to think that account was from a deserter who, in a great panic, represented what his fears suggested. I wait with impatience for another express from Fort Cumberland, which I expect will greatly contradict the former." The news got abroad, and the slaves showed signs of excitement. "The villiany of the negroes on any emergency is what I always feared," continues the Governor. "An example of one or two at first may prevent these creatures entering into combinations and wicked designs." And he wrote to Lord Halifax :³ "The negro slaves have been very audacious on the news of defeat on the Ohio. These poor creatures imagine the French will give them their freedom. We have too many here ; but I hope we shall be able to keep them in proper subjection."

Suspense grew intolerable. "It's monstrous they should be so tardy and dilatory in sending down any farther account." He sent Major Colin Campbell for news ; when, a day or two later, a courier brought him two letters, one from Orme, and the other from Washington, both written at Fort Cumberland on the eighteenth. The letter of Orme began thus : "My dear Governor, I am so extremely ill in bed with the wound I have received that I am under the necessity of employing my friend Captain Döbson as my scribe." Then he told the wretched story of defeat and humiliation. "The officers were absolutely sacrificed by their unparalleled good behavior ; advancing before their men sometimes in bodies, and sometimes separately, hoping by such an example to engage the soldiers to follow them ; but to no purpose. Poor Shirley was shot through the head, Captain Morris very much wounded. Mr. Washington had two horses shot under him, and his clothes shot through in several places ; behaving the whole time with the greatest courage and resolution."

3. Lord Halifax came from England with Braddock, and was one of the under officers in his command, Washington wrote more briefly, saying that, as Orme was giving a full account of the affair, it was needless for him to repeat it. Like many others in the fight, he greatly underrated the force of the enemy, which he placed at three hundred, or about a third of the actual number,—a natural error, as most of the assailants were invisible. “Our poor Virginians behaved like men, and died like soldiers; for I believe that out of three companies that were there that day, scarce thirty were left alive. Captain Peronney and all his officers down to a corporal were killed. Captain Polson shared almost as hard a fate, for only one of his escaped. In short, the dastardly behavior of the English soldiers exposed all those who were inclined to do their duty to almost certain death. It is imagined (I believe with great justice too) that two thirds of both killed and wounded received their shots from our own cowardly dogs of soldiers, who gathered themselves into a body, contrary to orders, ten and twelve deep, would then level, fire, and shoot down the men before them.”

To Orme, Dinwiddie replied: “I read your letter with tears in my eyes; but it gave me much pleasure to see your name at the bottom, and more so when I observed by the postscript that your wound is not dangerous. But pray, dear sir, is it not possible by a second attempt to retrieve the great loss we have sustained? I presume the General’s chariot is at the fort. In it you may come here, and my house is heartily at your command. Pray take care of your valuable health; keep your spirits up, and I doubt not of your recovery. My wife and girls join me in most sincere respects and joy at your being so well, and I always am, with great truth, dear friend, your affectionate, humble servant.”

To Washington he is less effusive, though he had known him much longer. He begins, it is true, “Dear Washington,” and congratulates him on his escape; but soon grows formal and asks: “Pray, sir, with the number of them remaining, is there no possibility of doing something on the other side of the mountains before the winter months? Surely you must mistake. Colonel Dunbar will not march to winter-quarters in the middle of summer, and leave the frontiers exposed to the invasions of the enemy ! No ; he is a better officer, and I have a different opinion of him. I sincerely wish you health and happiness, and am, with great respect, sir, your obedient, humble servant."

Washington's letter had contained the astonishing announcement that Dunbar meant to abandon the frontier and march to Philadelphia. Dinwiddie, much disturbed, at once wrote to that officer, though without betraying any knowledge of his intention. " Sir, the melancholy account of the defeat of our forces gave me a sensible and real concern"—on which he enlarges for a while ; then suddenly changes style : " Dear Colonel, is there no method left to retrieve the dishonor done to the British arms ? As you now command all the forces that remain, are you not able, after a proper refreshment of your men, to make a second attempt ? You have four months now to come of the best weather of the year for such an expedition. What a fine field for honor will Colonel Dunbar have to confirm and establish his character as a brave officer." Then, after suggesting plans of operation, and entering into much detail, the fervid Governor concludes : " It gives me great pleasure that under our great loss and misfortunes the command devolves on an officer of so great military judgment and established character. With my sincere respect and hearty wishes for success to all your proceedings, I am, worthy sir, your most obedient, humble servant."

Exhortation and flattery were lost on Dunbar. Dinwiddie received from him in reply a short, dry note, dated on the first of August, and acquainting him that he should march for Philadelphia on the second. This, in fact, he did, leaving the fort to be defended by invalids and a few Virginians. " I acknowledge," says Dinwiddie, " I was not brought up to arms ; but I think common sense would have prevailed not to leave the frontiers exposed after having opened a road over the mountains to the Ohio, by which the enemy can the more easily invade us. . . . Your great colonel," he writes to Orme, " is gone to a peaceful colony, and left our frontiers open. . . . The whole conduct of Colonel Dunbar appears to me monstrous. . . . To march off all the regulars, and leave the fort and frontiers to be defended by four hundred sick and wounded, and the poor remains of our provincial forces, appears to me absurd."

He found some comfort from the burgesses,⁴ who gave him forty thousand pounds, and would, he thinks, have given a hundred thousand if another attempt against Fort Duquesne had been set afoot. Shirley, too, whom the death of Braddock had made commander-in-chief, approved the Governor's plan of renewing offensive operations, and instructed Dunbar to that effect; ordering him, however, should they prove impracticable, to march for Albany in aid of the Niagara expedition. The order found him safe in Philadelphia. Here he lingered for a while; then marched to join the northern army, moving at a pace which made it certain that he could not arrive in time to be of the least use.

The calamities of this disgraceful rout did not cease with the loss of a few hundred soldiers on the field of battle; for it brought upon the provinces all the miseries of an Indian war. Those among the tribes who had thus far stood neutral, wavering between the French and English, now hesitated no longer. Many of them had been disgusted by the contemptuous behavior of Braddock. All had learned to despise the courage of the English, and to regard their own prowess with unbounded complacency. It is not in Indian nature to stand quiet in the midst of war; and the defeat of Braddock was a signal for the western savages to snatch their tomahawks and assail the English settlements with one accord, murdering and pillaging with ruthless fury, and turning the frontier of Pennsylvania and Virginia into one wide scene of havoc and desolation.

"General Braddock being mortally wounded at the battle of Monongahela, died on the third night. He was buried in his cloak the same night in the road, to elude the search of the Indians. Washington, on the testimony of an old soldier, read the funeral service over his remains, by the light of a torch. Faithful to his commander while he lived, he would not suffer him to want the customary rites of religion when dead."

4. Burgesses.—A member representing a corporate town in Virginia was formerly called a burgess, and the whole assembly was known as the

ENGLISH CLASSIC SERIES,

FOR

Classes in English Literature, Reading, Grammar, etc.

EDITED BY EMINENT ENGLISH AND AMERICAN SCHOLARS.

Each Volume contains a Sketch of the Author's Life, Prefatory and Explanatory Notes, etc., etc.

- 1 Byron's Prophecy of Dante.
- 2 Milton's Paradise Lost, and Paradise Regain'd.
- 3 Lord Byron's Masque, The Two Pawns, and others.
- 4 Dryden's Essay of Criticism.
- 5 Moore's Essay on Criticism.
- 6 Goldsmith's Descriptive Catalogue.
- 7 Scott's Waverley (Selections from Waverley).
- 8 Scott's Lady of the Lake, Minstrel, Introduction and Song.
- 9 Burns's Ode on the Destruction of the Broom, and other Poems.
- 10 Campbell's The Pleasures of Hope.
- 11 Campbell's The Pleasures of Hope.
- 12 Burns's The Pleasures of Hope.
- 13 Macaulay's Lays, and other Poems.
- 14 Shakespeare's Measure for Measure, and other Plays.
- 15 Goldsmith's The Vicar of Wakefield.
- 16 Goldsmith's The Vicar of Wakefield.
- 17 Goldsmith's The Vicar of Wakefield.
- 18 Addison's Sir Roger de Coverley.
- 19 Gray's Elegy in a Country Churchyard.
- 20 Scott's Lady of the Lake, (Conte I.).
- 21 Shakespeare's As You Like It, etc. (Selections).
- 22 Shakespeare's King Lear, and Richard III. (Selections).
- 23 Shakespeare's Hamlet, and Henry IV. (Selections).
- 24 Shakespeare's Henry VIII., and Julius Caesar. (Selections).
- 25 Wordsworth's Excursion, Ballad.
- 26 Pope's Essay on Criticism.
- 27 Spenser's Faerie Queene, (Books I. and II.).
- 28 Cowper's Task. (Book I.).
- 29 Milton's Comus.
- 30 Tennyson's Morte d'Arthur, The Lotus Eaters, Ulysses, and Tithonus.
- 31 Irving's Sketch Book. (Selections).
- 32 Dickens's Christmas Carol.
- 33 Carlyle's French Revolution.
- 34 Macaulay's Warren Hastings.
- 35 Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield. (Selections).
- 36 Tennyson's The Two Voices, and other Poems.
- 37 Tennyson's The Two Voices.
- 38 Tennyson's The Two Voices.
- 39 Tennyson's The Two Voices.
- 40 Tennyson's The Two Voices.
- 41 Tennyson's The Two Voices.
- 42 Tennyson's The Two Voices.
- 43 Tennyson's The Two Voices.
- 44 Tennyson's The Two Voices.
- 45 Tennyson's The Two Voices.
- 46 Tennyson's The Two Voices.
- 47 Tennyson's The Two Voices.
- 48 Tennyson's The Two Voices.
- 49 Tennyson's The Two Voices.
- 50 Tennyson's The Two Voices.
- 51 Tennyson's The Two Voices.
- 52 Tennyson's The Two Voices.
- 53 Tennyson's The Two Voices.
- 54 Tennyson's The Two Voices.
- 55 Tennyson's The Two Voices.
- 56 Tennyson's The Two Voices.
- 57 Tennyson's The Two Voices.
- 58 Tennyson's The Two Voices.
- 59 Tennyson's The Two Voices.
- 60 Tennyson's The Two Voices.
- 61 Tennyson's The Two Voices.
- 62 Tennyson's The Two Voices.

(Additional numbers on next page.)

ENGLISH CLASSIC SERIES—CONTINUED.

- 63 The Antigone of Sophocles. English Version by Thos. Francklin, D.D.
 64 Elizabeth Barrett Browning. (Selected Poems.)
 65 Robert Browning. (Selected Poems.)
 66 Addison, The Spectator. (Sel'ns.)
 67 Scenes from George Eliot's Adam Bede.
 68 Matthew Arnold's Culture and Anarchy.
 69 DeQuincey's Joan of Arc.
 70 Carlyle's Essay on Burns.
 71 Byron's Child Harold's Pilgrimage.
 72 Poe's Raven, and other Poems.
 73 & 74 Macaulay's Lord Clive. (Double Number.)
 75 Webster's Reply to Hayne.
 76 & 77 Macaulay's Lays of Ancient Rome. (Double Number.)
 78 American Patriotic Selections: Declaration of Independence, Washington's Farewell Address, Lincoln's Gettysburg Speech, etc.
 79 & 80 Scott's Lady of the Lake. (Condensed.)
 81 & 82 Scott's Marmion. (Condensed.)
 83 & 84 Pope's Essay on Man.
 85 Shelley's Skylark, Adonais, and other Poems.
 86 Dickens's Cricket on the Hearth. (In preparation.)
 87 Spencer's Philosophy of Style. (In preparation.)
 88 Lamb's Essays of Elia. (In preparation.)

*Single numbers, 32 to 64 pp. Mailing price, 12 cents per copy.
 Double numbers, 75 to 128 pp. Mailing price, 24 cents per copy.*

SPECIAL PRICES TO TEACHERS.

SPECIAL NUMBERS.

Milton's Paradise Lost. Book I. With portrait and biographical sketch of Milton, essay on his genius, epitome of the views of the best-known critics, Milton's verse, argument, and full introductory and explanatory notes. Bound in boards. Mailing price, 30 cents.

Milton's Paradise Lost. Books I. and II. With portrait and biographical sketch of Milton, his verse; essay on his genius, epitome of the views of the best-known critics, argument, and full introductory and explanatory notes. Bound in boards. Mailing price, 40 cents.

Wykes's Shakespeare Reader. Being extracts from the Plays of Shakespeare, with introductory paragraphs, and grammatical, historical, and explanatory notes. By C. H. WYKES. 100 pp., 16mo, cloth. Mailing price, 35 cents.

Chaucer's The Canterbury Tales. The Prologue. The text collated with the seven oldest MSS., a portrait and biographical sketch of the author, introductory notices, grammar, critical and explanatory notes, index to obsolete and difficult words, argument and characters of the prologue, brief history of English language to time of Chaucer, and glossary. Bound in boards. Mailing price, 35 cents.

Chaucer's The Squires Tale. With portrait and biographical sketch of author, introduction to his grammar and versification, glossary, examination papers, and full explanatory notes. Bound in boards. Mailing price, 35 cents.

Chaucer's The Knightes Tale. With portrait and biographical sketch of author, essay on his language, history of the English language to time of Chaucer, glossary, and full explanatory notes. Bound in boards. Mailing price, 40 cents.

Goldsmith's She Stoops to Conquer. With biographical sketch of author, introduction, dedication, Garrick's Prologue, epilogue and three intended epilogues, and full explanatory notes. Bound in boards. Mailing price, 30 cents.

FULL DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE SENT ON APPLICATION.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

0 011 697 577 4